Part I. Verona

CHAPTER I.

ROMAN VERONA AND VERONA UNDER THE SCALIGERI

THE main feature about Verona is its tombs. In no other Italian town can be found such a magnificent series of grand tombs, mostly standing out-of-doors, as in this delightful city. Not only the rulers, but the nobility and the wealthy traders of Verona were all determined to have superb monuments, erecting them in many cases during their own lives, and devoting to them all the genius and thought and skill that in other cities were given to the erection of churches, or to the painting of pictures, or to decoration.

The group of Scaliger tombs that we shall see in this city is quite unrivalled in beauty in Europe, while even more lovely is the Castelfranco tomb at St. Anastasia's Church, which is in its way the most perfect monument in Italy.

The next thing to notice in Verona is that its position is so fine, so surprisingly strong, and so placed as regards the Alps, that the city has always been a fortified place from Roman times down to the present, and that it has had several successive series of fortifications built for it, the marks of which still remain. We shall easily be able to trace its history by means of these fortifications. Lastly, we shall find in Verona churches built of brick that are quite unrivalled, and which have given an importance to the city in all books of architecture, and which draw students to admire it from all parts of the world. We have, therefore, plenty to see in this place and must be prepared not to hurry over our sightseeing, but to do it leisurely and well.

First of all let us consider its Roman history, and visit the **Arena, its greatest Roman monument. As you enter the city in the omnibus, you will not fail to see this great Amphitheatre, which you are bound to pass on your way into the town. It is a most impressive erection, perhaps more so than the one in Rome, by reason of the perfect condition of its interior. From quite early times great care has been bestowed upon it, and it has been the duty and the pride of each chief magistrate, from the thirteenth century downwards, to spend some money upon this splendid old ruin, keeping it in as good condition as time would permit. The outer part was much injured on two occasions by earthquakes, and of the external arches only four out of seventy-two remain; but the inner circle is complete. The most imposing view of the building is to be obtained from the roof of a neighbouring house, when the vast extent of the erection can be appreciated; but as you will probably not have the pleasure of this sight, the next best thing is to enter it and walk all around it from the top tier of seats. It is nearly one-third of a mile round, but the only way to appreciate this distance is to walk it. It will hold 23,000 persons, and when full, must have been most imposing in appearance.

I am not given to details in the way of figures in this book, as those can be found in the guide-books; but I think it is needful to mention these to you that you may adequately understand the magnificent proportions of the place. Let your companion go down into the middle of the floor space, and then regard him from your position on the top, and you will see how vast is the depth of the great building. Yet mark how easily, how well, every person could see the spectacle without obstructing in any way the view of any one else, and how quickly the whole place could be filled or emptied of its spectators by the sixty-four entrances to it. If it happens to be one of the occasions of public rejoicing when you are in Verona, you will probably see the old Arena full of people, as at times it is still used in the summer or early autumn for exhibitions of feats of horsemanship, or for spectacular displays. It is a welcome treat to see an Arena as it used to look in times long past when crowded with a demonstrative audience. You will, however, be able to realize in your own mind, even when it is empty, the look of the place when the Roman emperor or his representative sat in state, and when gladiatorial conflicts took place within its walls, and when the wild beasts were allowed to attack the defenceless Christian martyrs in this very spot.

After remaining for some time within these stately walls, pondering over their history and the greatness of the nation that built them, I want you to go to the other side of the city to see the remains of a * Roman theatre that have been discovered. Ask for the Ponte Pietra, which is an important bridge in the bend of the river Adige, which flows all around the city, and then, crossing this bridge, turn off to the right for two minutes' walk to the Teatro. You will be sure to see a boy who will gladly, for a penny, fetch the old woman who has charge of this ruin, and she will show it to you. There are two portions of it to be seen, and therefore when she has shown you one, do not go away as if you had seen all, but follow her to another door not far off, and then, underneath the houses, you will see a more important part of the building that has quite recently been uncovered. Altogether some of the rows of seats, part of the stage and a room behind, also a portion of what is supposed to have been a family box, as it still bears the name of its owner over its arch, can be seen. It is interesting to notice the canals by which the water for nautical shows was introduced, and to see the corridors which ran beneath the rows of stone seats. The theatre is set in the side of a hill, much of it being excavated out of the rock, and the natural formation of the hill was skilfully used in planning the building. For years all trace of the existence of this place was lost, and it was rediscovered through the energy of a Veronese antiquary, who expended a considerable sum, some thirty-five years ago, upon buying and pulling down the houses that covered the site, and in digging out all that can be seen of what must have been in its time a very important theatre.

From these ruins I want you to retrace your steps and go back into the town, not visiting the churches that are so close to you on this side of the river, but returning to inspect some more remains of Roman work, not forgetting, however, as you recross the river, to notice how beautiful the city looks from that bridge, and how splendidly you can see the fine architecture of the great Church of St. Anastasia that stands out on the opposite side of the stream. Back we come into the Corso Cavour, down which runs the tramway, and then, crossing the street, we shall see at the entrance to the Piazza Borsari the archway or porta that I have brought you to see.

This is later Roman work, executed in the time of the Emperor Gallienus, about 264, and forming part of the fortifications that the Romans built around this city. This is the chief entrance gate in those fortifications, and at one time it had upon it in large bronze letters an inscription commemorating the tyrant who caused it to be erected. The letters are gone long ago, but from the marks they left behind them the inscription has been read. The arch is a double one, and in its architecture curiously unlike the plain stiff dignity that marked purer Roman work. This one has pediments over the archways, and similar ones higher up over the smaller arches that adorn the upper part, but it is an impressive grim old arch standing to face the world. It will be well to notice marked upon it a date, September 17, 1882, which date you will get accustomed to seeing in many parts of the city, even inside the churches. It marks the highest point reached by the waters of the Adige during the greatest flood that has ever happened in the history of the city; on which occasion, owing to the river being choked with ice, the water spread all over the city to this terrible height and did a vast amount of injury to buildings, and caused much suffering and distress.

Jump in the tram as it passes you, and in two minutes you will be in the Via Leoni, and at the corner of a side street you will find the remains of one more Roman archway, the Porta Leoni, with a Corinthian column on either side of it, and above them three windows with pilasters.

There are other Roman remains in the museum, but for the present this is all that we shall inspect of that period. Following the Romans came the Goths, and beyond the river we still can find the remains of the huge walls built by Theodoric, in triple courses of brick and stone, which are now covered by the more ornamental walls built upon them by the Scalgeri, who crowned them with the forked battlements that can be seen from all parts of the city and on all sides. These walls and battlements you will see better when you take a carriage from Hotel Europa, as I most strongly recommend you to do, after the galleries close, say at 4.30. Drive out around the city, high up above the river, passing out of the place by a great gate called the Porta San Giorgio, and after driving for awhile along by the tram line that goes to Trento, return toward the Castel San Pietro up to the Castel San Felice, and then on toward the Porta Vescovo, and so into the city. The Castel San Pietro that you will see is part of the palace of Theodoric, and the Roman style of its building will be noticed. The other Castel that lies so much higher and commands the whole district is part of a much later system of protection invented and built by the great architect Sanmicheli, of whom I shall have more to say later on.

I want you now to give some attention to the story of the city in mediæval times, and it will be well, therefore, to go briefly over the history of the place ere we set out again for a walk through its streets. This history is very much connected with the great family of the Scaligeri, an old Veronese family dating back to the eleventh century. The city was, of course, originally Lombard, but it fell under the sway, in the thirteenth century, of a cruel despot, named Ezzelino da Romano, and it was his cruelty to certain members of the Scaligeri that brought them into notice. Ezzelino died in 1259; and in 1260 the people of Verona resolved again to be free, and raised Mastino della Scala to the position of Capitano del Popolo. He was at that time the head of his family, which was reckoned as one of the chief aristocratic ones in Verona, and he had been serving against his will in the army of the tyrant. He ruled over Verona for fifteen years, and then was murdered by the members of a conspiracy formed from those who hated him, and who gave as their excuse for the deed his unwillingness to bring to justice a man who had offended them. So little was their excuse accepted by the Veronese that the place where the foul deed was done was at the time and is still down to the present day called "volta barbara." Mastino was succeeded by his brother, Alberto I., who had for some previous years ruled in Mantua, and who was a peace-loving and enlightened ruler. In his time the rule that was temporarily placed on the shoulders of Mastino was given over to the Scaligeri family in a much more complete fashion, as the chroniclers record that the words of the people to Alberto were, "Viva Alberto assoluto oggi e per sempre!"

Alberto ruled from 1277 to 1301, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Bartolommeo, who died in 1304. Upon the death of Bartolommeo, the second son, Alboino, came to the throne, and he surrendered up his power as Capitano del Popolo to the Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire in token of his supremacy, and received it back, granted to him and his descendants, as vicar for the Emperor Henry VII. Alboino was a man of poor health, and he associated with himself on the throne his brother Francesco, a much more powerful man, who was styled joint vicar for the emperor with Alboino. In 1311 this Francesco, called, for some unknown reason, Can Grande (the Great Dog), succeeded to the entire rule, owing to the death of his brother, Alboino, and he ruled till 1329 in the most brilliant manner. He was succeeded by his nephew, Alberto II., who lived but one year; and then came Mastino II., who died in 1351. Following him came Can Grande II., who was murdered in 1359, and was succeeded by his brother, Can Signorio, who died in his turn in 1375. Then followed a time of confusion, and in 1389 Gian Galeazzo, as we have already seen, captured Verona. At his death it fell into the hands of the ruler of Padua, Francesco II. di Carrara, and in 1404 both cities were taken by the Venetians and remained associated with the Republic of Venice down to the time of its fall in 1797, when it was overthrown by Napoleon.

There was in Verona, therefore, a regular succession of rulers of one family, lasting from 1259 to 1389, and covering the time of the greatest prosperity of the place. Francesco, who was called Can Grande, was the greatest of these rulers, and his court was one of the most magnificent in Italy. Dante was received by him, and in that way he has rendered his name ever famous. Mastino II. was at one time in his life an equally popular and wealthy sovereign, as his sway was felt from Lucca to Vicenza and Padua, and as far also as Parma, but he went into warfare against the Visconti and lost much of his possessions. Can Grande II. and Can Signorio were successful monarchs, and again Verona took a high position and the arts received attention, and the city was beautified; but then followed the time of confusion and the glory of the Scaligeri was over for ever. Let me take you around to the little out-of-doors cemetery in which these great rulers lie buried. Pass into the central piazza of the city, the picturesque Piazza delle Erbe, cross it to the Palazzo del Ragione, and pass by the Via Costa into the Piazza dei Signori. Here lived the Scaligeri in the palaces that surround the square. Their chief seat was what is now called the Palazzo del Consiglio, and in that building is the family chapel. On the south side are two other buildings, now called the Tribunale and the Prefettura, built as palaces by Mastino and Alberto, but now used for civic purposes, the chief part having been adapted as a prison.

The Via Arche will take us to the ** tombs which stand close to the little Church of Sta. Maria Antica, which was the family burying-place for the Scaligeri, and within whose walls they had worshipped for generations. Notice all around the tombs a fine railing of iron trelliswork, in which is conspicuous the Scala, or ladder, the family badge. It is all buckled together and is therefore not rigid, but can be moved by the hands and is extremely fine wrought-iron work. A small fee must be paid to enter the enclosure and look around at this singular assemblage of tombs. In the corner as we go in, on the left, is the double effigy of Mastino II., the ruler being represented on horseback on the summit of the pyramid, and recumbent in death below. Next to it are three tombs in a row, Can Grande II., Alboino I., and Bartolommeo. Then in the far corner is the splendid tomb of Can Signorio. Away to the right in the open courtyard is the tomb of Alberto, nearer the church that of Mastino I., then higher up Alberto II., also called Giovanni, and over the door of the church is the sarcophagus of Can Grande I. This last tomb is also a double one, like the one we first saw, but the sarcophagus rests upon huge figures of dogs from whom he had his strange sobriquet, and who are represented by the sculptor as supporting the shield on which are the ladders. Mark the dignity of the horseman on the right, high up on the apex, and also the beauty of the carving on the archway and cusps over the recumbent figure.

After you have noticed all the tombs of this great group of rulers buried in the midst of their people in the full sight of all who were to serve under their successors, return for a while to the tomb of Can Signorio over in the corner of the courtyard. It is one of the finest things that the fourteenth century produced in its later and more florid period, and was the work of Bonino da Campiglione, whose name can be read in the inscription above the two eastern columns, in which he records the fact that he was not only the designer of the stately pile, but also the sculptor who carved it. Notice upon the square pilasters, the figures of the warrior saints, St. Quirinus, St. Valentine, St. Martin, St. George, St. Sigismund, and St. Louis. Above them are the figures of the Virtues,—Faith, Prudence, Charity, Hope, Justice, and Fortitude,—while, above all, is the equestrian figure of the ruler himself, and then the more you gaze the more you will appreciate the subtle beauties of this most exquisite work. There are three other fine tombs of the same family within the little courtyard, but there is nothing in Italy which you will see that in its way will equal the beauty of this monument, which reveals the hand of an artist of the highest merit, albeit his name has perished and only his work remains.

THE CASTLE, VERONA.

CHAPTER II.

THE CHURCHES OF VERONA

NOW, to begin the study of the churches of Verona and to understand their architecture, you must commence with the ** Church of San Zeno, which is situated at the opposite end of Verona to where you are now standing. The church is on the extreme edge of the city, and if you are pressed for time, you had better drive to it, as it will take quite half an hour to walk. But if you walk, then the better way is to go down the street opposite to Sta. Anastasia, which is the Corso Cavour, through the Borsari gate, on past the Castel Vecchio, and turn round by the river and follow its course, till you see the great campanile of the church before you, and then turn off to the left to it. The church is a twelfth-century one, and is in practically its original condition. The entrance doors are even older, and the bronze reliefs, which are not beaten work but cast, are about the oldest things of their kind in the country. They are attributed to the ninth century, and represent in the very boldest and most archaic manner scenes from the Old Testament. There are forty-eight of them fixed to the massive doors, and they are interesting as the very beginnings of an art that was destined to have such a future. Now look up at the front, and you will see that the portal is richly sculptured with various scenes. The one over the door is said to represent the deputation sent to St. Zeno by the Emperor Gallienus, and all around are various scenes from Bible history, each explained by some short verses carved underneath it.

On the top of the door-posts are represented the twelve months, and on one of the side panels underneath the first set of scenes on the right is the well-known representation of the Emperor Theodoric riding headlong, as a wild huntsman, to the devil. The ingenious craftsman who is responsible for all this work in 1140 has left his name in the carvings, and we still read, "Salvet in eternum qui sculpsit ista Guglielmus," as in the bronze castings just named we find the maker's name, Figarolo, recorded with the same prayer.

Now let us enter the church and we find a building so simple, so good, so mysterious, that we are at once attracted by its beauty. We step down into this splendid nave, and look up to the raised choir with its curious screen, along the front of which is a row of figures of the Twelve Apostles sculptured in the fourteenth century. In the centre is the wide flight of steps stretching down into the crypt, and on either side of it are the two smaller flights which lead up to the choir itself.

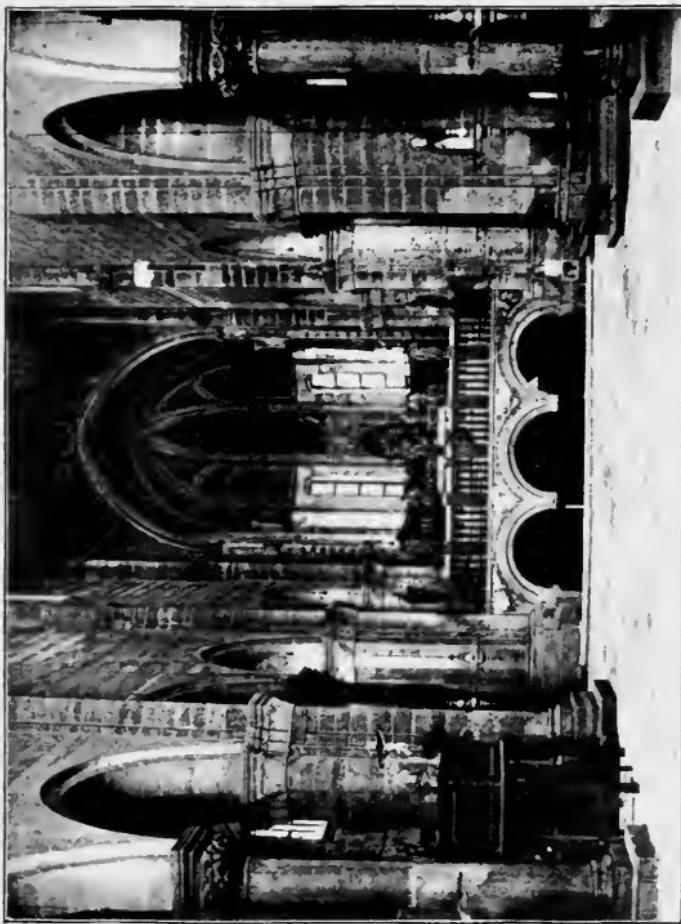

The chief object to be seen in the nave is the huge Coppa di San Zeno, an enormous cup of porphyry, measuring nearly fourteen feet across, which is said to have originally stood outside and to have been used for washing the feet of the pilgrims who came to the shrine. The local legend relates that the devil brought it as an offering to San Zeno, and, not obtaining his desire from the saint, attempted to carry it back, but was prevented from so doing by the orders of the bishop, and had to leave his treasure behind. It is a very beautiful piece of porphyry, and is doubtless of great antiquity.

Notice the altar-piece by Torbido, a somewhat crowded arrangement with fat plump figures, on the first altar to the right, and then walk up the nave and descend into the crypt ere you go to the choir, as I want you to notice how curiously the columns which support its roof are carried right up through the roof on either side and form piers in the choir above. Many of the columns have remains of fresco upon them and are worth attention.

At the very end is the modern shrine of San Zeno, surrounded by a railing which was erected in the fourteenth century, and which, like the railing around the Scaliger tombs which you have just seen, is not rigid, but is buckled together quite loosely, so that it gives to the hand and can be shaken to and fro. It is most skilfully made and should be examined.

Ascending from the crypt we climb the steps and find ourselves in the choir. The statue of the patron saint in marble, on the right, is a very venerable one, going back to the ninth century, and having the special peculiarity that the saint, who was a fisherman, is so represented, and has a fish of silvered wood at the end of his rod. On the opposite side is a statue of St. Proculus, a piece of fourteenth-century work, and of about the same date are the quaint frescoes that can be seen over the arches of the choir and elsewhere. The fine picture that hangs to the right of the choir is an important work by Mantegna, depicting the Madonna and Child with angels and eight saints. The architectural work, the flowers, and the fruits are all most characteristic, and with the strangely complicated draperies clearly mark the work of Mantegna, amongst whose pictures this one holds a very important place. The predella pictures are copies. The carving on some of the capitals is worth notice, and was done by the same sculptor who left his name on his work in the crypt — Adamius.

This attractive old church is specially representative of the Middle Ages, and the more impressive as it is built of an arrangement of delightful yellow stone, brick, and marble, characteristic of the buildings of Verona, which is noticeable in almost every church in the city. Here we specially mark it, as we have not seen this method of building before.

The framework of the rose window and the quaint colonnade in the centre of the west front are, you will notice, of marble.

Pass now outside the church and turn down the little passage by the left into the cloisters, which are of remarkable beauty and were built in the twelfth century. Notice how curiously the twin columns that surround them are joined at the top and bottom by a short horizontal piece of marble. This was not attached, but was part of the original block of marble, and was carefully left by the carver of the columns, at a considerable increase of his labour, in order to show his skill and leave a quaint feature, which adds to the appearance of the united columns. In some cases this little attachment has been broken away, but it will be found in a great many places round the cloister.

On the side opposite to the entrance is a sort of room in the arcading, supported upon columns of different diameter and having at its ends columns of quite large size united, as are the others, by this same sort of tongue. This place originally held a large bowl or trough containing water at which the monks could wash, and it seems likely that it was raised above the ground and perhaps approached by steps, as the columns denote the existence of some vessel of great weight that needed strength to support it. There are some fine tombs in this cloister, two close to one another in the southeast angle, having upon them the ladder, the crest of the Scaligeri, and containing the remains of certain important members of that family, one of whom was prior of the Convent of San Zeno. In this cloister is also a small chapel in which are some interesting remains of carved stonework from the neighbouring church.

The adjoining campanile is one of the finest in Italy, a most stately tower, with a double gallery of arches near the top and surmounted by a spire with four corner turrets. It stands quite alone, in the manner of the Veronese campaniles, and gives great dignity to the church.

On the opposite side is a quaint brick tower, which was a part of the monastery that adjoined the church, but originally belonged to an important dwelling that tradition says was the palace of King Pepin, the son of Charlemagne. It is crowned with the Ghibelline swallow-tailed battlements, which are to be seen all around Verona, and is said to have been the first building that had these ornaments and the one from which all the others derived them.

When we leave San Zeno, if we are to pursue our examination of the churches in anything like chronological order, we ought to go to the extreme other side of the city, cross the Adige, and visit San Stefano; or else if on that side of the river, we should see that venerable church first ere we come to San Zeno. But to walk or drive back and forth is not, under ordinary circumstances, a wise thing to do, and means the waste of a great deal of time; so as there is an interesting church near by and we shall not have occasion to come into this part of the city again, it will be well to go from San Zeno to San Bernardino before returning to the city.

If, therefore, we cross the piazza to the Via San Giuseppe, cross that street, and continue down the Via Lungo San Bernardino, we shall arrive in a very few minutes at this church. A small cloister in which is a door gives admittance into the church. If the cloister is closed, as is sometimes the case, ring the bell, and a monk will admit you and will open the church.

We have now left the venerable days behind, and are in a fifteenth-century building, of which the chief sight is the ** Capella Pellegrini, the work of the great Veronese architect, Sanmicheli. The custode will open it for us, and we can enter this lovely little circular chapel. It is rather a mental strain to so suddenly leave the solemn mysterious grandeur of San Zeno, and jump to the stern refined beauty of this classical building, but I think if you will sit down and look round the building you will not fail to admire it. It is considered to be one of the most beautiful examples that can be found of pure classical ornamentation, and although not absolutely perfect, as the purists in architecture will tell us, yet it is very nearly so, and contains much refinement of treatment with pediments, pilasters, mouldings, and cornices which are all of the Corinthian order of exquisite grace and delicacy. Notice the decreasing squares in the dome, all in such perfect proportion; the shells above the recesses; the spiral work on the columns; and the well-planned entrance doorway and the cornice over it. Sanmicheli was one of the great men of Verona and an undoubted genius. He was mainly a military architect and, as I have already stated, was responsible for the later fortifications of the city. We shall also see his work in some of the palaces and bridges of the place; but he never executed anything finer or more characteristic of his great love of classical detail than this little chapel, square on the outside and circular within, upon which he bestowed the very best of his skill.

The chief of his work is in Verona, but some of his buildings are to be seen in Venice, a fine church in Orvieto, and fortifications as far afield as Corfu, Cyprus, and Crete.

There is nothing else that need detain us in this church unless we are particularly interested in the painting of the Brescian Morone, whose work we can see at the fourth and fifth chapels and near to the choir arch; but as we enter Verona we ought to notice the finest of the gates that Sanmicheli erected — the Porta Palio.

We can walk from San Bernardino by the fortifications and come to this fine gate, an ingenious example of the combination of the beauty of Corinthian architecture with the needs of military fortification. We then go straight down the Via Porta Palio to the Castel Vecchio, a grand fourteenth-century fortress built by Can Grande II., of which the exterior only remains in original condition. There is no need for you to enter the building, as all the interior has been adapted to modern use, but you will do well to stay and admire the impressive exterior, "noble and picturesque," as it has been well called, and adorned with those great swallow-tailed battlements of which I have before spoken.

On our way back to Hotel Europa we shall pass several of the palaces that Sanmicheli designed for the great Veronese families. They are not now, as a rule, occupied by the families for whom they were built, and some of them are degraded into the position of stores, or cut up for small dwellings, but they retain their old names, and their fronts well illustrate the variety and skill of the great architect who designed them. Three of them are in the Corso Cavour: the Palazzo Bevilacqua, with a row of busts over the windows and spiral columns between the windows over the balcony. This is on the right, and opposite to it is the Palazzo Canossa, with a row of statues on the roof; and almost next, the Palazzo Portalupi, which is a good example of Ionic design.

I want now to take you over the river to see the little * Church of San Stefano, which, as the original cathedral, ought to be seen before we enter the present cathedral, and which in some ways might have been our starting-point in our survey of the churches of Verona. We cross the Ponte Pietra, — the same bridge we crossed on our way to the Roman theatre, — but turn in the opposite direction to the theatre — that is, to the left — and in a minute are in front of the church. It is sure to be locked, as few persons visit it, but a boy will fetch the old woman who has the key.

The appearance of the church will recall San Zeno, but it is plainer and more archaic. The crypt is said to date back to the eighth century, and the church was certainly founded over an older one in the eleventh century, and part of the architecture is of that date. The round arches in the crypt reveal their great age, and the curious frescoes that adorn them belong evidently to the period before the twelfth century.

The feature of the church is, however, the choir, which will be found of quite unusual construction, and containing the throne for the bishop. Beyond the choir is yet another older choir, forming part of the original church, and also decorated with frescoes. More than twenty of the bishops of Verona lie buried in this church, and from an architectural point of view it will be found to be not only one of the most interesting, but certainly one of the most puzzling in its complication of choirs.

Perhaps, as we are close to it, we may as well walk on and see San Giorgio in Braida, a church which stands close to the Porta San Giorgio, and which is again the work of San-micheli. The Church of San Giorgio is a good example of his florid style, not nearly so fine as the Capella Pellegrini and not nearly so pure in style, but very effective.

There are some good pictures in the church. The Tintoretto over the door cannot be seen, as it is hung too high and the light is impossible; but the altar-piece is a fine work of Paolo Veronese, very decorative and effective. It is not, however, entirely the work of the master, but was finished by his pupils, and is therefore very unequal in its merit. There is a beautiful Moretto to be seen over the fifth altar to the left, and the work of his rival Romanino, which has been divided into two parts, near the organ, representing the Martyrdom of St. George. The great Veronese artist, who began as a miniaturist, Girolamo da Libri, can also be studied in the church. At the fourth altar on the left and over the fourth to the right, is an important work by one of his pupils, Brusasorci.

In the Girolamo da Libri the three angel faces are of exquisite beauty; two of them are singing, and the third is playing on a lute.

Now we will return over the Ponte Pietra, or over the Ponte Garibaldi; by either bridge we reach in five minutes the Duomo.

It will at once remind us of San Zeno, and very much of it belongs to the same date as that church, notably the porch at which we make our first stop. There are the same two sets of columns resting upon the backs of mystic animals — in this case griffins; and over the entrance and around are reliefs similar to those in San Zeno, but not so fine or so interesting. On the porch appear the two strange figures of the warrior guards of Charlemagne, well known in story and legend as the Paladins Roland and Oliver, the one armed with a sword and the other with a mace. These were carved, so the inscription states, in 1135.

The feature of the interior is the curved marble screen, with its stately colonnade surmounted with a splendid crucifix in bronze, by Gian Battista da Verona. The marble screen was designed, as no doubt you will have realized, by Sanmicheli, and is a charming example of his refined work. On the right of it is the tomb of St. Agatha, a Gothic monument dated 1350, which in the sixteenth century was enclosed in a lovely Renaissance framework.

There are some pictures which are worthy of notice. An Adoration of the Kings, by Liberale da Verona, on the second altar to the right; and on the first to the left, a celebrated Assumption, by Titian, which was considered worthy to be carried off in the beginning of the century to Paris, and was later on restored to the church.

The most important thing in this cathedral, after the delightful classical screen, is the font, and that occupies a separate building attached to the main one. There is a passage leading to it on the left of the choir, and the custodian will take you into what is termed the Church of San Giovanni in Fonte, where will be found the enormous ** font, a huge block of reddish-yellow Verona marble, covered on the exterior with delightful Lombard twelfth-century reliefs depicting the early life of Our Lord. It will be well to walk round this font and carefully examine all the reliefs upon it, commencing with the Annunciation and completing the series with the Baptism, as they abound in quaint humour, and tell their stories in a charmingly naïve manner. In the centre of the huge font, evidently intended for the immersion of a considerable number of persons, is a smaller quatrefoil-shaped enclosure, also of marble, in which the officiating priest stands and which he enters, as the attendant will most graphically describe to you, by a set of steps and a movable platform which extends over the larger font. There is a chapel to the right in this church which is covered with rich fresco-work, and is worth mention.

Now come outside and look at the cloisters which, like those we have already seen, are composed of columns in pairs, but not arranged quite as those at San Zeno are, as in this case the bases and capitals of each pair of columns are united. Each pair is, however, cut out of a single piece of marble; and on one side of the cloister the beautiful arcading is double. Notice also, ere you leave the place, the remains of a fine mosaic pavement which has been discovered. It is, of course, Roman work, but whether it belonged to some thermæ or to a temple cannot yet be determined.

Now for Santa Anastasia, which we passed by before we went to San Zeno, and which we must now visit. Go round the Duomo by the Church of the Font, and pass the Archbishop's Palace, entering the front court of that palace for a moment in order that we may see the rear part of the Duomo and San Giovanni in Fonte, which look remarkably picturesque from that garden. In the Archbishop's Chapel there are some pictures by Liberale, but I have never been fortunate enough to see them, as on each of the occasions on which I have been at the place the chapel has been in use for service, and, as it is small, I have preferred not to go in to see the pictures. You may be more fortunate than I have been, and if so I shall be glad to hear your opinion as to these works. In some ways Liberale is the most interesting artist in the school of Verona, and we shall remember his picture of St. Sebastian in the Brera, in which the background is a scene in Venice, with its palaces and canals, and in which the people take so keen an interest in the spectacle. Follow the Via del Duomo and it will bring us right to the church.

The * main doorway is of extreme loveliness, and the brickwork of all the exterior is of special beauty, the mouldings worked in brick, and the rich decoration on the façade in the same material, making the church notable even in this city of fine brick and marble churches. The interior is notable for its scheme of decoration, much of which, especially about the vaulting, is contemporary with the building. Probably at one time it was entirely covered with fresco decoration, sufficient of which still remains to give a fine effect, and to suggest how superb must have been the original appearance. Note the curious fact that no gold is used in this interior decoration. Another important feature of this church is to be noticed at the second and third chapels on the right, which will be found surrounded by very rich carving in stone and marble. The designs of these arches which frame in the altars are splendid, and include creatures, such as lizards, frogs, tortoises, birds, and flies, all set in the midst of fine flowing arabesque work, and sculptured in the most perfect manner, so deeply undercut as to stand out in quite wonderful relief.

As you enter you will not fail to be attracted by the grotesque humpbacked figures that bear the holy-water stoups, one of which, that on the right, was carved by Alessandro Rossi, father of the humpbacked (Gobbino) painter, and the other by the father of Paolo Veronese — Gabriele Caliari.

In the second chapel on the right are some very early frescoes by that interesting Veronese artist, Altichieri, representing Knights of the Cavalli family kneeling before the Virgin, in which the horse (Cavallo) stands as a sort of rebus on the family name; but as we shall see more of this artist's work at Padua, I will defer any comments upon him until we reach that place.

The terra-cotta reliefs in this church merit attention.

The fifth altar on the right, the one facing down the church, contains a curious coloured piece of terra-cotta, representing the Entombment, in which the anguish of the faces is particularly well presented. In this same chapel there is a good piece of quaint ironwork in the form of a lamp.

Other terra-cotta reliefs are to be found in the Capella Pellegrini on the left, and are fifteenth-century work depicting the life of Our Lord.

Of the pictures in this church, the most noteworthy is the *fresco by Pisanello which is over the arch of this Capella Pellegrini, and which is unfortunately not in good condition and too high up to be properly seen and appreciated, but as a good work of the great medallist, whose influence was so important and so far reaching, it deserves attention.

In the right transept is a fine work by Girolamo dei Libri, representing the Virgin with St. Thomas Aquinas and St. Augustine, a Dominican friar, and the two donors of the picture. It is a very architectural work with pointed arches, and the painting of the marble mosaic and wreaths is very characteristic of the master at the middle of his career. In the fourth chapel on the left is a Descent of the Holy Ghost, by Giolfino, a dark, rich, noble work; and on the second, on the left, is another picture by the same painter of St. George and St. Erasmus, somewhat cold and stiff. Notice the donor of the work peeping over the altar. Mark the delightful pavement in this church of red, white, and gray marble, and the great variety of its designs and patterns.

CHAPTER III.

THE ART OF VERONA

IT may be well perhaps, on leaving Sta. Anastasia, to go to the ** Picture Gallery instead of continuing the round of the churches, as we have already seen certain important pictures in the churches that we have visited; and as we possibly have not any very clear idea as to the school of Verona and its chief men, a visit to the little Pinacoteca will enable us to arrange our ideas in clearer form and to study the characteristic features of each artist.

To reach it, we pass over the Ponte Navi, which is the bridge over which the tram-line goes; and, in fact, the tram will take us to the very door of the Palazzo Pompei in which is the collection of pictures. It is just the other side of the river, a minute's walk to the right after crossing the bridge. The palace is a good building built by Sanmicheli and bequeathed by its last owner, Count Pompei, to the city as a picture-gallery. The lower part of the building is what is termed rustic-work, and is plain, rough squared stonework, which, by its simplicity, affords a pleasing foundation for the elaborate Doric work which is over it.

Before we enter the gallery it will be well if I give you a short note on the Veronese painters. I need not refer to the very earliest men, the painters in fresco, whose archaic works we have seen in the crypt of San Zeno and in San Stefano, but will begin with the work of the second half of the fourteenth century in which first we see the influence of Giotto in the paintings of Altichieri and Avanzi or Avanzo. We have just seen frescoes by Altichieri, and, as I have already stated, we shall find more and better work by him in Padua. It is not easy to distinguish the work of the two artists, as they were together in almost every important scheme of decoration, and their characteristics have not yet received the close attention at the hand of an expert which would enable the part that each friend took in the fresco to be determined. They were, of course, influenced or inspired by Giotto, whose work was in their time the subject of much attention, and whose frescoes in the Arena chapel they must have closely studied. But, as Layard points out, they must not be taken as followers or pupils of Giotto, as they preserved their Veronese character in the deeper, fuller colouring, brighter in tone and more sparkling than Giotto's, and in the more solid forms that they depicted, less idealized than those of Giotto and with more roundness and bulk. In their hands dramatic energy began to be first clearly seen in fresco, and marked individuality in each figure to be apparent. With them must be mentioned one Martino, who did some noteworthy frescoes, which are in the gallery which we shall see presently, and then we come to Pisano, or Pisanello.

His chief work in Verona I have just mentioned, and we shall again see his fresco-work in San Fermo with his signature, but he is specially known for his skill as a medallist, and his wonderful painting of portraits. From him the idea of portraits in fine profile was certainly derived, and it can be traced in his followers. Labouring with him in Venice was Gentile da Fabriano, whose work we mentioned in the Brera, and whose love of relief work in his pictures, glorious combination of colours, and passionate fondness for gold and brilliance and glow so clearly distinguish him. Both he and Pisanello were fond of introducing birds and other creatures into their works, and this habit they handed down to their successors.

Following him in the regular series of painters that worked in Verona, we come to a man named Domenico Morone, whose son, Francesco, was much more noted, and whose work we shall see in the gallery, and to much greater advantage in the Church of Sta. Maria in Organo, to which I will take you later. He is a delicate and graceful painter, and his colouring is strong and full in power, while his ideas of well-balanced composition are notable. We shall see presently a charming composition of his, a Madonna and Saints in fresco, delightfully grouped, now in the gallery (560), but at one time on a house near the bridge which we have just crossed.

Then we come to Liberale, who was educated as a miniaturist, and who never lost his love of fine detail and his power of representing it. In the gallery we shall see some of his work in this way, and many fine paintings by him in oil. Bonsignori was his pupil, and inherited from him the love of architectural details that distinguished the master, together with a force and strength that is his own.

Giolfino, at whose picture of St. George and St. Erasmus we have just been looking, was also a pupil or a follower of Liberale. He is a very unequal painter, and at times, as in this very work, part of the picture is done with energy, excellently drawn and powerfully coloured, and part of it is stiff and formal. As a rule his shadows are too dense, and so his pictures lack attractiveness.

Another man who can only be studied in Verona is Caroto, whose masterpiece we shall presently see in San Fermo. He is a remarkable master, very rich in colouring, powerful in drawing, and curiously partaking of the Leonardo style in his work. There are portions of his fresco-work yet to be seen in the streets of Verona, especially near to the Church of St. Thomas of Canterbury, and he can be well studied in the Church of St. Eufemia.

The most poetical of all the Veronese school is Girolamo dei Libri, who, like Liberale, was educated as a miniaturist, and derived his sobriquet from the books which he decorated. He is really a fascinating man, and his pictures are laden with the delights of the earth,—fruit, flowers, music, and landscape of rare beauty. He can be well appreciated in the gallery at whose doors we are still standing.

His contemporary was Cavazzola, whose real name was Paolo Moranda, a very earnest, strenuous painter, who moved away from the realistic attitude of his predecessors, and began that method of full decoration, great style, and powerful colouring that was characteristic of Paolo Veronese and so of the Venetian school. Cavazzola was a very brilliant colourist, but his colouring did not assist the emotion of his pictures, and when at times he rouses a deep pathos and a tender sympathy by his compositions so well conceived and so ably drawn, it is his colouring that is not equal to the occasion and prevents the picture being a complete success.

Torbido is still more Venetian, partaking of the character of Giorgione, and probably studying under him in Venice. He is closely connected in art with Liberale, under whom it is supposed he had his first instruction, but he is a worker of peculiar interest and deserves to be better understood and appreciated. His works have had the high distinction of being confused with those of the most poetic of all painters, Giorgione, and even now there is some doubt as to a portrait we shall see in the gallery in Padua which has been attributed to each master in turn.

Lastly we come to Brusasorci, another pupil of Liberale, and one whose influence on Veronese can be seen. He was an artist who loved full flowing wine-like colour and great showiness. Then at the end is Farinato, who is a late man, dry and somewhat uninteresting, delighting in big pictures, dull colouring, and deep shadows. Paolo Veronese, I need only name, as he really belongs to the Venetian school. After therefore this long digression, we will see what we can learn from the masters of whose works we have been speaking. We shall find in this gallery several notable works that do not belong to the school of Verona at all, but are of sufficient importance to be noticed, and so I will point out the chief pictures that deserve attention. There is no catalogue of the gallery that can be purchased, only hand screens in each room.

Room I. contains only two important pictures :

34. An early Perugino, one of the earliest works known by this master, and representing a Madonna and Child with St. John and two angels. A part of this work is by a pupil, but the central portion is marked by the spirit of the master.

32. Madonna and Child and St. John, by Titian; also an early work.

Room II. has several pictures of interest.

155. Madonna and Child with two saints, by Francia; a delightful work by this charming Bolognese master, signed.

86. Presentation in the Temple, by Giovanni Bellini; a very charming work, signed.

93 (under it). Adoration of the Magi, by Perugino; a late work.

88. Holy Family, by Andrea del Sarto; much cleaned.

97. A Portrait of a Man in black, by Antonio Moro; a splendid representation, truthful and powerful.

120. Madonna and Child with St. Joseph, by Perugino.

121. An Annunciation, by Garofalo; a gay, bright picture by this delightful Ferrarese artist.

150. The Death of a Saint, by Lo Spagna, the pupil of Perugino and the painter of the Sposalizio at Caen.

117 (over the door). A Pietà, by Montagna; worth attention.

There is nothing in Room III. that need detain you.

In Room IV. it is well to notice the following:

240. Madonna and Child Sleeping, by Giolfinio; cold, hard, but full of expression.

250. Christ Washing the Feet of His Disciples, by Bonifacio; good picture, fine colouring, but no reverence at all in it, just a fine piece of decoration.

252. Madonna and Child with St. Sebastian and St. Roch.

253. Baptism of Christ. Both of these works by Girolamo dei Libri.

238. St. Anthony, by Brusasorci.

Room V. is the really important room for you to see.

There are two works by Cavazzola in this room, from which you will be able to get a good idea of his power, and of the decorative value of his work.

The most remarkable of all is perhaps 335, a Madonna and Child with St. Francis and St. Dominic, and below SS. Elizabeth, Bonaventura, Louis, Ivo, King Louis, and Elzearius, together with the Contessa de Sacco, the donor of the picture. The movement in this work is rather awkward and the grouping formal, but the work is a fine and impressive one without doubt.

Near by is a wonderful series of works, 292, 3, 4, 5, representations of saints; 298, the Scene of the Doubt of St. Thomas; 303, the Flagellation of Christ; 305, the Washing of the Feet; and 308, the Crowning with Thorns — all highly decorative works, well drawn, powerfully conceived, and not lacking either in expression or pathos. Critical investigation may discover that the forms lack muscle, that the draperies are hard, and the movements are formal, but the pictures show an important master at his best, and illustrate his methods and his power.

339 is a delightful Girolamo dei Libri, a Virgin and Child with St. Joseph and the angel Raphael and the youthful Tobit, of rich Venetian style of colouring and splendid accessories. This is a signed work.

333 is by the same master, Madonna and Child with St. Andrew and St. Peter, and showing the Baptism in the distance, and under it is 334, a splendid Cima of Madonna and Child with two saints, full of the delicate refinement that marks the best work of that artist.

Over the door is a good Caroto (343), rich and lovely. It depicts the Three Archangels with Tobit, and is a signed and important work.

Two other Carotos are in this same room — 325, Madonna and Child, and 300, the Washing of the Feet — and in these his Lombard style can be seen and the curious affinity that he has with such men as Luini and Solario.

A fine Moretto portrait, 287, must not be overlooked, as it is a really good work, and a signed and dated one; nor must 296 be forgotten, as in this Madonna and Child with two saints Torbido is thoroughly Venetian.

Having looked at these pictures we turn our attention to what hangs opposite to them, the fragments of miniatures from service-books executed by the two great Veronese artists, who trained themselves by this work. Very lovely we shall find some of this miniature work to be, and full of interest bearing upon the later productions of these two men, Liberale and Libri.

The chief picture in Room VI. is the 351, a very fine work by Carlo Crivelli, representing the Madonna and Child with angels, and signed by the artist. The hair of the Madonna has been restored, otherwise the picture is in good condition. 392 and 394, the Deposition and the Bearing of the Cross, are by Cavazzola, and are the finest works by the master in the gallery. They were painted in 1517, as shown by the inscription, and are full of dignity and pathos, but are not aided in their expression by their colouring.

365 is a Crucifixion, by Jacopo Bellini, a solitary, grand work; and 376 (Resurrection) is attributed to Squarcione, and is certainly of his school, and may conceivably have some of his own work in it. There are two very curious early anconas in this room that should be marked. 355 is by an unknown man called Turone, signed with his name and dated 1360, and will therefore take a place at the very beginning of Veronese art. The other one is equally early, and is signed Stefano da Zevio, and dated 1363 (374), and these two pictures are evidence of the existence, at a very early date, of a school of painting in the city from which descended the men whose paintings we have been examining.

In the remaining rooms of the gallery you need not stay, as the pictures are not worthy of your consideration after these greater ones which we have studied, and most of them are by later or insignificant men.

In Room XII. there are frescoes, some by Paolo Veronese important to a close student of his art, and a delightful one, by Foppa, of an angel; also the fine Morone fresco (560) of which I have spoken, and frescoes by Caroto, Martino, and Giolfino; but beyond these, you may pass Rooms VII. to XIII. and leave the gallery.

CHAPTER IV.

OTHER CHURCHES, THE PIAZZA, AND A GARDEN

SAN FERMO, one of the finest brick churches in Italy, is built in the Veronese fashion of alternate rows of brick and marble. Outside is a fine tomb of the regular Verona style under a canopy, and attached to the side of the church on the left of the entrance. It is to the memory of Fracastoro, the chief physician to Can Grande, and a man who was held in high repute, and who in his own special science was far in advance of his associates. The door by which we enter is the one at the left of the church, as the chief central door (close to the tomb) is but seldom opened. The interior is remarkable, as there are no aisles, and the roof, which will not fail to attract attention, is of great beauty. It is made of larch, and finely decorated, producing an excellent effect.

The chief treasure which the church contains is unfortunately far from being complete, but is in a chapel opening out from the north side. It is the tomb erected by Giulio and Raimondo delle Torre to the memory of their father Girolamo and their brother Antonio. The father and son were both of them leading physicians at Padua, and taught in the university, and the monument is by Riccio, a Paduan architect. It is of marble, and has upon it some very grand bronze ornaments, but the best of these works were carried off to Paris, and still remain in the Louvre, and are replaced on the tomb by copies. What there is, however, of the original is of great beauty and refinement, and demands careful attention.

Having looked at this, let me take you into the Chapel of the Sacrament, which is a large one on the left, and which contains the masterpiece by Caroto which I have already mentioned. It is signed and dated 1528, and is by far the best work that this very unequal artist ever did, and is of glorious rich colouring. It depicts the Madonna and Child with St. Anna, and below are four saints, St. John, St. Peter, St. Roch, and St. Sebastian. The pulpit is worth attention, as the canopy is the work of an important artist, Barnabò da Modena, who lived and died in Verona, and whose tomb is close to his pulpit in the fourth chapel on the right, with a recumbent figure upon it. He is said to have carved the tomb during his lifetime, and placed it in the church in the place that had been allotted to him for a burial-place.

There is a fine work by Domenico Morone, near the choir, of three saints, and there is a work by Torbido, in his pre-Venetian style, in the third chapel on the right, but the chief sights in this church are the building itself, the Caroto, and the splendid tomb.

Cross again the Ponte Navi, but turn in the opposite direction to the picture-gallery, and go to the left, along the Via Scrimiari and the Via Seminario to the Church of Sta. Maria in Organo, and at once ask for the sacristy. As we enter it, we shall see a lovely painting by Girolamo dei Libri, a Virgin and Child with St. Catherine and St. Stephen, a sunny picture full of delightful work. The architecture, the leaves, the fruit, the effect of sunlight, all render this altar-piece, which has unfortunately been injured by cutting, one of the most charming pictures by Libri to be seen in Verona, and if you look well at it you will get an idea of his fascination that will help you to understand him and appreciate the beauty of his work.

Now turn into the ** Sacristy and here you will find the best examples of Francesco Morone, and a most charming room. All along the wall are half-length figures of Olivetan monks in their delightful white habits, recalling the famous series painted at Monte Oliveto by Sodoma, and in the lunettes are portraits of the Popes who sprang from that Order. The decorative effect of all this is quite lovely, but the finest piece is to be seen far up in the corner, half-hidden by the cupboard. It is a portrait of the clever monk who did the intarsia work in this church, Fra Giovanni, who died in 1520, and who was one of the greatest masters of this method of working that Italy ever produced. The inlaid work in this sacristy, and also in the choir, is all his doing, and very remarkable it is. Go carefully round both series of panels and mark them well. You will notice how important they are from another point of view, as they represent scenes in the city that have long since altered, and scenes in Rome; and are therefore permanent records of matters of fact. When the great flood overtook Verona in 1882 these fine pieces of woodwork were in the greatest danger, and were in fact at one time entirely covered by the torrent, but were rescued as very precious treasures, and carefully cleaned from the mud and water, so we are still able to appreciate their beauty. Notice also the crisp carving near the intarsia panels, which is also the work of the same monk. Do not hurry away from these panels, as they are as fine of their kind as you will ever see. Among the views you will notice the Arena, the Castel San Pietro, the various houses of the Order near by and at Siena, both interior and exterior views, the Porta Borsari, the Castel Vecchio, and the streets of Verona, showing even the floods that have always been one of the chief troubles of the city.

Having studied all this work to your heart's content, then turn attention to some of the other treasures in the church. There is a splendid candelabrum in the choir of the monks, carved out of walnut wood by another monk, one Fra Giacomo, who spent the spare time of his life in doing this splendid work. It is well worth attention. In the third chapel is another painting, by Francesco Morone, representing the Madonna and Child, with St. Augustine and St. Martin, signed and dated 1503, and in the right transept is a good example of the pictures of Guercino of St. Francesca Romana, not as unpleasant as that artist's pictures so often are. The choir is painted by Farinato, and by Brusasorci; the painting by the latter is worth your notice, but that of Farinato lacks expression and interest. As you leave the church, notice the campanile which was erected from the design of the same clever monk who did the admirable intarsia work inside.

Now I want to give you a pleasure of quite a different kind. We will leave churches and pictures for awhile and see nature. From this church go along the Via Giardino, stop at the * Palazzo Giusti, and crossing the entrance court, ring the bell at the gate for the gardener. You will at once be admitted into the garden, which by the great kindness of the owners the public are allowed to visit, but which very few persons see, as the privilege is not generally known. You will find before you a magnificent avenue of tall cypresses, and on either side beds of flowers of glowing colour. Pass up the avenue by the little paddock in which are some charming tame deer and gazelles, and continue up the ascent until you come to a staircase in a sort of summer-house. Ascend this and you will find yourself on a higher level yet of the garden. Continue to ascend and you will eventually reach another summer-house, which also you can ascend if you like, but if you have done enough climbing, sit down and rest, and look out over the incomparably lovely scene before you. Hardly any city is more lovely in its situation than Verona, and from this garden you look all over the place. You mark the Adige, source of life and also source of danger to the Veronese, winding its way in and out of the city. You see the rear view of San Fermo, stately in its deep red brickwork, and you gaze right out to where the lovely Campanile of San Zeno points toward the sky. You can see the Duomo and St. Anastasia and many other of the churches, but you cannot hear a sound. Around you are the trees, and above you is a glorious blue sky, and, believe me, you are gazing upon one of the fairest views that you will see in your travels, even finer — because more varied and richer in colour — than the view over Rome from the Pincian Hill. You are welcome to stay as long in these gardens as you may please, and if you have brought any lunch with you, can eat it as you sit on the high terrace close to the wall of the top summer-house, and then, with your field-glasses, you can sweep the horizon, finding every moment some new sight upon which to feast your eyes.

Sit for a moment and think over the sights we have seen. We have commenced with Roman times, and have seen the Arena, the Theatre, and some mosaic pavements; then we have moved on to the Gothic times and the period of Theodoric, not forgetting that period of Gallienus which is very much later than the time of the early Roman buildings; and from the Gothic times we have come to the eighth and eleventh centuries in San Stefano and then to the twelfth in San Zeno. We have noticed Lombard work in the reliefs that we have seen in the porches, on the huge font, and inside some of the churches; and then we have seen the thirteenth-century work in the building of St. Anastasia and many of the palaces. A little later on we have seen San Fermo, and then the series of tombs which grew richer and richer as the Renaissance came on; from the exquisite simplicity of the plain sarcophagi came the Gothic refinement of the Castelbarco tomb, followed by the florid Can Signorio tomb. In the fifteenth century, during the Venetian domination, we have seen the work of Pisanello and his successors, and then, as the Renaissance opened, we have seen its influence in the successive artists of the Veronese school, in the workers in intarsia, in the architects, leading on up to Sanmicheli; in its painters in miniature and in its carvers in wood and stone. We have followed the art of Verona from the early frescoes in San Zeno down to the dry and uninteresting work of Farinato, who died in 1606. And now let us descend from our elevation and go and spend a time in the famous Piazza dell' Erbe, which, more than any other part of Verona, reflects its grandeur, and shows the moving life of the city as it now is.

We leave the garden reluctantly, as it is so lovely, and, giving the fair custodian a trifle as we go out, pass again into the busy city. If we have time, we can visit the Church of San Nazaro e Celso close by, and see a lovely work by Bonsignori, a rich Montegna, some interesting works by Farinato, and the earliest fresco-work in Italy after the period of the Roman catacombs. On our way back to the hotel we can look at the Church of St. Thomas of Canterbury, and see the tomb of Sanmicheli, and some paintings by Brusasorci, and notice the curious frescoes on the houses near by. We can see some lovely tombs outside the Church of SS. Apostoli, close to the house where Giolino lived, which is still covered with the remains of fresco-work (near the Porta Borsari). In Santa Eufemia we can see another superb tomb, fine even in this city of grand tombs, and supported on great carved brackets, and a very curious early fresco by Stefano da Zevio; and we can see two more fine tombs in the Church of Santa Maria della Scala, a little church in the Via Scala, with a delightful portico.

None of these sights are needful to see, although all are well worth seeing, but the ** Piazza dell' Erbe must be seen. I would recommend you to go early in the morning, when the market is in full swing, as then the gaily coloured umbrellas are all up over the stalls with which the piazza is filled, and the place is much more picturesque than in the afternoon, when it is cleared up, and the gossipping old women with their fruit and vegetables and animals are all gone; but whenever you see it and at any hour of the day it is charming. It was the Forum in Roman times; it became the centre of the city in the Scaliger period, and from it the laws were promulgated. In the time of the Venetian domination it again took high place, and from it were the decrees of the great Republic announced; and even now all the life of Verona centres around this piazza. Notice the fountain in the midst, which was originally erected by a Lombard king, it is said, in the tenth century, but was enlarged, beautified, and furnished with a better supply of water by Can Signorio in 1370.

Mark the little open Berlina in the very centre where the Scaligeri took the oaths before their people, where the laws were promulgated, and where sentences were pronounced; and then, farther on, see the tall column of red marble on which is the lion of St. Mark, the symbol of the power of the great Republic. When the rule of Venice over Verona ceased, the lion was gladly overthrown, but it has since been replaced, as now it is only a symbol of a memory, and does not stand for the sign of a great power.

All around the piazza are fine buildings. On one side is the Casa dei Mercanti with its arcade, which was built by Alberto I. in the year of his death, and was opposite to his own residence. At the end of the piazza is the Palazzo Maffei (or Tresa), which has a very curious and well-designed circular staircase, which you can see if you walk into the court-yard, and at the corner is the Palazzo dell Ragione, now used as a court-house. Turn down by this palace along the Via Costa and you will be in the next piazza, Piazza dei Signori, looking once more at the palaces of the Scaligeri, now called the Tribunale and the Prefettura, which are on its south side. Opposite to them is the Loggia or Old Town Hall, which was erected from the designs of another clever monk, one Fra Giocondo, and is one of the loveliest buildings in Italy, very rich in fine detail. The effigy of the monk can be seen on the left corner pillar. He was an excellent architect, and designed many buildings in Verona, and even went as far as France, besides working in Venice and Rome. His sculptured decorations are always rich and graceful. You will mark the Annunciation in bronze over the portal, a good work by Girolamo da Campagna, and then up above it you will see the statues of the famous men connected with the city, Pliny, Catullus, and others. The fine tower opposite will attract attention, and the splendid staircase leading to it, and close by the Scaligeri Palace is a delightful courtyard that is worth seeing, and in which there is a covered staircase under an arcade of good brickwork.

You will notice that I have said nothing as to the tomb of Juliet, and it is because that which is now shown as the tomb is a shocking fraud, and the original tomb has long since been destroyed. There is not even a house that can with any degree of certainty be called the residence of either family, whether Montague or Capulet, and all that are pointed out by officious guides may be taken to have nothing whatever to do with the family or the story. There is plenty to see in Verona without wasting time, money, and emotion in looking at frauds.

Part II. Padua

CHAPTER I.

GIOTTO IN PADUA

THE work of Giotto in the little Arena Chapel at one end of the town, and the cult of St. Anthony of Padua in the great Church of Il Santo at the other end form the chief attractions to this little city, and render it so interesting to the art student, the ecclesiologist, the architect, and the antiquary. They overshadow all other attractions in the place, but they do not complete the list of all that is noteworthy in Padua, and this we shall soon ascertain for ourselves as we move about its quaint and curious streets.

It is strange that, although the city bears the name of Padova la Dotta and is of the greatest antiquity, yet of its earlier history we can scarcely find any trace remaining, and we have from existing remains to begin our investigations, not with the Roman period of its life, but with the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. Its origin is attributed by Virgil to Antenor, mythical king of Troy and brother of Priam, and you may perhaps be recommended by some guide to go and see what is termed the tomb of this gentleman; but as it is very doubtful as to whether he had an existence at all, and the tomb that bears his name is quite as late in date as the ninth or tenth century, I do not recommend you to visit it.

There is no doubt that Padua in the time of the early Cæsars was a most important and a very wealthy place, but its wealth excited the cupidity of its enemies, and it was repeatedly attacked and overthrown by the Goths and other barbarians. To their destructive power we owe it that Padua contains no monuments of its Roman age that are of importance. You will find some few things in the museum when we reach it, but there is nothing of supreme importance such as we have seen in Milan or Verona. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, however, it took a position that we can appreciate by many evidences, but although in the strictest chronological order we ought to begin our work in Padua by the Palazzo della Ragione, which is the chief of its buildings and was begun in the twelfth century, yet so all-important in the history of the place are the frescoes in the Arena Chapel, and so closely are they connected with the history of this Palazzo della Ragione, that I suggest we commence with them, and on leaving our hotel turn to the left and find this little shrine of the art of Giotto.

The Chapel of the Madonna dell' Arena stands close to the Church of the Eremitani near to the centre of the city, and within three minutes' walk of either of the chief hotels. It is situate in an oval garden, which still preserves the outlines and site of the ancient Roman arena, and it was erected in 1303. There was, in all probability, an earlier church than this one upon the site, and Ruskin tells us that the place had been used for mystery plays connected with the festival of the Annunciation before this church was erected.

Its founder was one Enrico Scrovegno, the wealthy son of an avaricious father, Rinaldo, whose evil life and cruel usury caused him to be selected by Dante for mention in the "Inferno," in the seventh circle of which he placed him. Rinaldo was clearly a man of very bad character, and Dante speaks of him in language of withering scorn; but his son, probably desiring to efface the memory of his father's unhappy life and also to atone for his sins, erected close to the fortress which he had built in the Arena garden this charming little chapel, and sent for Giotto to decorate it for him. It is said that he was assisted in his enterprise by a religious Order called the Cavaliers of Mary, of which Order he is supposed to have been a member, and which was established to protect the dignity of the Virgin against the attacks of heretics. In all probability, as Lord Lindsay was the first to suggest, the chapel was built for the use of this Order, and in it were its ceremonies conducted, and hence the reason for the subjects that Giotto was given for his series of frescoes. Giotto came in to decorate the chapel in 1306, but whence he came or how Scrovegno knew of his work, we cannot tell.

I must not in this place go into a lengthy statement as to the history of this great master who revolutionized art; but a few words will not be out of place on the change which he wrought. Ruskin, whom it is quite impossible to overlook when Giotto is to be considered, and to whom every student of art is deeply indebted for his able studies of this place and its frescoes, states that the three innovations of Giotto consisted in “the introduction (A) of gayer or lighter colours; (B) of broader masses; and (C) of more careful imitation of nature than existed in the works of his predecessors.”

As to the first, he draws attention to the depth of the colours in the Byzantine paintings, in mosaics, and in manuscripts, and the contrast that Giotto’s work affords to all of them. As to the second, he notes how the broad masses of colour in the draperies of Giotto’s work contrast with the minute, almost niggling style of those who preceded him; and as to the third point, the study of nature, which is “the great strength of Giotto,” he states that he introduced the “gestures of living men, the incidents of every-day life, and the portraits of living persons,” which he was the first to use in fresco work. The comparison which Ruskin makes in more than one place in his writings between the Pre-Raphaelite movement in England and the movement initiated by Giotto is an important and inspiring one, and helps us to understand both the opposition which the innovators received in each case, and the wide-spread influence which flowed from their determined efforts. The work of a man like Giotto must always be interesting to the world. He was one of its greatest men, one of its chiefest masters; "not only," as Ruskin states, "an accomplished artist, but the undisputed interpreter of religious truth by means of painting over the whole of Italy." Amongst other qualities that we ought to notice in these frescoes are the following:

Giotto never painted any other than religious subjects, and we shall find nothing profane or even connected with heathen mythology in his works.

He painted with a broad free hand and without any of the delicacy of finish that distinguished those who followed him, such as Fra Angelico, Benozzo Gozzoli, or even Altichieri. He tells his story very simply, with as little in the picture as is needed to explain the meaning, and with no recondite symbolism or elaborate imagery. His scenes can be easily read and interpreted, and his symbols are simple and easy to be understood.

His colouring is bold, grand, and impressive, albeit light in tone, and, again to quote Ruskin, "he has a truly mediæval love of dividing his picture into quaint segments of alternating colour."

Finally, his works have no elaboration of shadow, but are direct and true. They never contain any pictorial accessories which do not necessarily belong to the telling of the story; but go straight to the point, and having told what is desired, leave the illustration at that point and do not elaborate it for the sake of effect.

You will be struck on entering by the extreme plainness of the building. It is a simple oblong, with six tall windows on one side and a plain wall on the other, and Giotto's decoration covers both walls and roof. The subject of the whole of the coloured panels is the life of Our Lord and the life of the Madonna, while below, in chiaroscuro, are the Virtues and their antagonistic Vices. At the west end is the Last Judgment, and on the eastern wall is a Christ in Glory. The choir is not by Giotto, but by one of his pupils or followers, very probably by Taddeo Gaddi. The chapel still belongs to the descendants of the family of its founder, and a custodian is placed in charge, who dwells in the house in the garden, and who is a well-informed man, and has useful catalogues to lend to visitors.

The series of subjects is as follows, the notable ones being marked with an asterisk (*):

1. The Rejection of the Offering of Joachim because he had no children.

2. Joachim Retires to his Sheepfolds.

* 3. The Appearance of the Angel to Anna.

A delightfully simple naïve scene in which the humility of Anna is clearly shown.

4. The Sacrifice of Joachim. Notice that the sacrifice is actually being burned, and the white skeleton entire, "not a bone broken," is on the altar, — also that the hand in the sky personifies the Creator.

5. The Appearance of the Two Archangels to Joachim, to tell him that his great desire would be accomplished.

GIOTTO.—THE SACRIFICE OF JOACHIM.

* 6. The Meeting of Joachim and Anna at the gate. This is a very charming, sweet picture, full of tenderness.

7. The Birth of the Madonna.

8. The Presentation of the Madonna. Notice, as Lord Lindsay points out, that the Madonna is not a child, but "a dwarf woman," as the painting of childhood was one of the later achievements of art, and in Giotto's time was not possible.

9. The bringing of their rods to the High Priest by the marriageable men. Mark the skilful way in which the face of the priest is painted.

10. The Watching of the Rods before the Altar.

* 11. The Betrothal of the Virgin. This scene, which was to be the prototype for so much that is beautiful in Italian art, deserves careful attention, as in a small space and with few figures, Giotto has succeeded in giving a solemnity and seriousness to the scene which is very marked. The anxiety of Joseph, the timidity of the Virgin, the disappointment of other suitors, and the astonishment of one of them are all very noteworthy.

* 12. The Return of the Madonna to her Home. Mark the slow, solemn swing of the procession as it steadily moves along.

13 and 14. The Annunciation. These two panels are separated one from the other by the archway as was so often the custom. The angel is marked by great dignity and serenity; the Madonna is quiet, calm, and humbly kneels to receive the mystic message.

We now commence the lower tier of panels, having commenced at the altar and come round to it again.

* 15. The Salutation of Mary and Elizabeth. A homely scene, so natural, so true to life, so tender, that words are not needed to express its beauties.

* 16. The Nativity, and the Appearance to the Shepherds. Mark how the Madonna is herself attending to her first-born babe, and notice the delight of the angels and their movements.

17. The Offering of the Magi. The camels are comical, but no doubt the best attempt that Giotto could make of a beast that he had never seen; but the kingly dignity that he gives to the whole scene is remarkable. Ruskin points out that an angel stands to receive the gifts which the king himself would just touch in token of acceptance, and then pass on to his attendant.

GIOTTO. — THE BRINGING OF THEIR RODS TO THE

18. The Presentation in the Temple. Notice how curiously the Child is struggling to leave the arms of the old man and return to His mother,—so perfectly natural, and so true to life. See also the angel coming to give the message to Simeon, and mark the scroll carried by Anna which bears the words on it: “Quoniam in isto erit redemptio seculi” (Since in Him shall be the redemption of the race).

19. The Flight into Egypt. The effect of night is well conveyed by the dense black of some of the draperies, and by the unusual arrangement of the lights.

20. The Massacre of the Innocents. An unsatisfactory panel.

21. Christ in the Temple. Too much injured to be properly seen.

22. The Baptism of Our Lord. Both Perugino and Francia seem to have adopted in their treatment of this subject the idea set in this panel by Giotto. In this, more than in any other scene, is the influence of the old mosaists of Ravenna to be seen. It is more purely Byzantine than any other of the panels.

23. The marriage at Cana in Galilee.

* 24. The Raising of Lazarus. This is one of the finest scenes in the series, the astonishment and almost repugnance of the bystanders, the fright of others, and the pallid whiteness of Lazarus, who so evidently is only just returning to life, are so well represented.

25. Our Lord Riding into Jerusalem.

26. The Expulsion of the Traders from the Temple.

27. Judas receiving the Money from the High Priest. Mark the demon behind the traitor.

Now we commence the third tier.

28. The Last Supper. This is quite a different scene from those which were painted later on by Italian artists. There is here no sign of excitement or anxiety, and the moment has evidently not yet arrived when the tragic words have been spoken. Giotto has just represented here a quiet party of friends saddened by the thought that their Head is about to leave them, and engaged in serious conversation.

* 29. The Washing of the Feet of the Apostles. Notice that this takes place in the same room as the foregoing scene, and that the Twelve Disciples are present as, according to Giotto's idea, Judas had not yet left.

30. The Kiss of Judas. Mark how Giotto has represented the traitor, not as a foully wicked man, but as a fat, stupid fool.

31. Christ before Caiaphas.

32. The Scourging of Our Lord. The patience of Our Lord under suffering appears to be the chief thought in the artist's mind.

* 33. Christ Bearing His Cross. A wonderful fresco, in which the central figure stands out sublimely from all those around it. Mark the taunts of the men who stand near, and also the way in which the women are roughly held back from approaching too close.

* 35. The Deposition from the Cross. A

* 36. The Resurrection. A very lovely fresco. The angel is beautiful. The Christ is full of dignity, and the Noli me tangere is well expressed by His action. Mark also how thoroughly asleep the soldiers are, and how natural are their attitudes.

37. The Ascension. Notice how, as Ruskin points out, Giotto has shown the entire figure ascending up to heaven, and not a part only, and also note how the curved lines, both of the figure and of the two groups of angels, give the appearance of slow, swinging, upward movement that is so desirable in such a scene.

38. The Descent of the Holy Ghost.

Having gone round the entire series very carefully and without hurry, let me beg you to return again to the altar, and begin on the left to examine with equal care the symbolical paintings that adorn the lowest tier of the walls. There is no doubt that in some of the coloured frescoes Giotto had the assistance of his pupils, although the idea in every case is entirely his own, and probably the greater part of the execution; but it is a tradition in the chapel that whatever he may have received in the way of help as to these works, he did the symbolical paintings entirely himself, receiving no aid from any one. They are arranged in pairs, each pair being a Virtue and a Vice contrasting one with the other, on opposite walls, and therefore it is desirable that you should move from one side of the chapel to the other in your examination of them, in order to fully understand their teaching. The Virtues look toward the Christ in Glory, but the Vices in the opposite direction, towards the Last Judgment.

GIOTTO. — JUDAS RECEIVING THE MONEY FROM

1. Prudence. Janus-headed, gazing at a convex mirror, and holding a pair of compasses.

1A. Folly represented in the dress of a fool.

2. Fortitude. A resolute figure, clad in armour and wearing the skin of a lion, waiting behind her shield, on which is a lion and the broken heads of spears, and armed with a weapon with which, when called upon to use, she is prepared to defend herself.

2A. Inconstancy. A girl trying to balance herself upon a whirling ball and falling in the attempt.

3. Temperance. Mark the bit in her mouth and the care with which she is binding the sword which she holds into its scabbard that it shall not be readily withdrawn.

3A. Anger. A furious woman tearing open her clothes and doing herself bodily harm.

4. Justice. This and its opposite Vice are much more elaborately symbolical than those which precede them. Justice is seated upon her throne holding the scales one in each hand. In one is represented an angel crowning the good; in the other an executioner slaying the criminal with a sword. Below her feet is a panel in which various persons are going about their business in a happy, prosperous manner, proving the security of good government.

4A. Injustice. Here is a giant sitting at the door of his castle, but the path up to him is overgrown with thorns and briars. His countenance is of a forbidding character, his fingers are terminated with claws, and he holds a hook in one hand and a sword in the other. Below, in the predella panel, can be seen murders and assaults, the miseries of a weak and cruel government.

5. Faith. She grasps the cross in one hand, and in the other holds a scroll on which are the words of the Apostles' Creed. At her feet she tramples upon the various objects connected with astrological lore.

5A. Unbelief. A man who turns his back upon the message from heaven which the Almighty Father holds out to him, but moves to the flames of fire, turning his gaze towards an image of Idolatry which is tied round his neck and to which he is bound. His eyes are overshadowed by the broad brim of his helmet so "that he shall not see."

6. Love. She receives gifts from Heaven and gives them out to others. Her face is full of joy, and she stands upon the treasures of the earth.

6A. Envy. An old woman standing in flames; her fingers are those of a wolf, and she has the ears also of that terrible beast. A serpent comes out of her mouth, and turns to bite her face; she attempts to grasp it, and fails, and her face bears a most malignant look.

7. Hope. She rises, stretching out towards the crown which the angel is bringing to her, and her feet leave the ground as she rises up from the earth to "things above."

7A. Despair. A woman who has hanged herself at the instigation of the foul spirit who has come for her soul.

There yet remain for examination the Christ in Glory over the arch of the altar, and the Last Judgment on the west wall. The former is not in good condition, and it is hardly possible to make out whether it is intended for a representation of the Christ or of the Almighty Father, but it is believed to be the Christ. All around are throngs of adoring angels.

The Last Judgment derives its special interest from the little group in the centre, quite unconnected with the general character of the work, in which Enrico Scrovegno is seen accompanied by a monk, perhaps the one in whose custody the chapel was first placed and who was to officiate at its altar, presenting his chapel to three angels or archangels, who are receiving it at his hands and addressing him.

We have now seen all that is Giotto's work in this chapel, and a few more words as to its value may not be out of place. It must not be supposed that these frescoes are beautiful in the ordinary sense of the word. It will yet be found on careful examination that they are most beautiful, and herein is, of course, the paradox. The drawing is quaint and inaccurate, the figures are wooden, and some of them almost lifeless. The buildings are absurd, and are supported upon long attenuated columns that would not hold the buildings in their position and would fall by reason of their very length and weakness. The animals are quite ridiculous. Many of the persons depicted are too long, too thin, and have no proportion and no proper form. The colouring is in places weak, the grouping is poor, the scenes at times almost laughable in their quaint conceit — and yet these frescoes are among the world's greatest treasures. They have been visited with eager desire and studied with profound attention by all the great artists of the world; have received the closest attention from students; and are reckoned as chief amongst the works of the earliest Renaissance. What is the reason for all this attractive force? Why are these frescoes so important to the student? I hope that having examined them, some part of the answer to this question will be found in your own mind.

It is not only because in Giotto we have the very beginning of the art of painting; that in him we see the precursor, the innovator, the original genius, and that in his work we see the origin of that vast Renaissance movement that was to spread all over Italy and produce so many wonderful paintings, buildings, and sculpture, although that aspect of his work is an interesting one; but it was because in his frescoes we have the work of a man of profound reverence, of absolute truth, and of consummate knowledge. From the stiff formalism that had clothed the art of painting in rigid lines Giotto broke forth. He represented things as he saw them, to the best of his ability, with the best of his knowledge, and in a simple, direct manner.

He was all the time profoundly reverent as to the character of the scenes he was painting, but he never forgot the claims of his art, and with that marvellous insight that he possessed, he seized hold instinctively of the essential in drawing, and left alone the purely accessory.

His work is straight to the point, clear and incisive as the note of a bell, firm and definite, so that it can almost be felt and taken hold of; telling its story in so distinct a manner that its meaning never can be missed; significant, earnest, and intense, and therefore by its very convincing truth, appealing at once to the mind of the man who studies it. It conveys to him the knowledge that here is the message of an artist who has a gospel to proclaim, and who has the power to demand attention at once and create an emotion suitable to what he has to say.

There is nothing in these frescoes that is not needed, there is no line without its purpose, nothing in the way of wasted energy. As the Castelbarco monument at Verona was so plain, so severe in its lines, and yet when investigated was found to be so complete in all its details and so perfect in the way in which it illustrated its own erection and stability, so, in the same way, are these frescoes complete as works of art, although the work of a man who knew but little about drawing or perspective. Giotto was but at the beginning of the long road of painting. He had never seen such creatures as he introduced into his frescoes, but yet he presented his message with that absolute truth which makes it convincing, and which proves an insight into life and a knowledge of human nature marking him out from his fellow men.

Gaze on these silent walls, eloquent with all the story painted upon them seven hundred years ago, which has remained to teach the greatest men of each successive century, and realize how noble a man was the happy, bright, popular Giotto who laboured here in this little room, doing his best for the prince who had commissioned his work, putting his whole heart into the labour, and working for untold generations to admire and to love that expression of his genius with which he clothed the bare walls.

The decoration of the chapel is, besides all this, a work of the greatest charm in its general effect. The beauty of each panel has not been sacrificed to the effect of the whole, the corelation of panel with panel and colour with colour has never been forgotten; and to throw up the works in colour to greater effect, the architectural character of the lowest tier, with its marble-like pilasters and its gray symbolic scenes so bold and strong, was specially prepared that the entire decoration might be welded together.

Above is the deep blue sky, represented dotted with numberless stars, from which the prophets gaze forth.

The whole thing is complete; nothing has been forgotten, and there is no room in Italy or in Europe that is so worthy of attention as this little Chapel of the Arena, nor any which has excited the eloquence of the greatest of the writers and speakers of the world, and with so much reason for all their eloquence.

Beauty alone, to return to my first paradox, is not the emotion that is produced by a burst of colour, or the contemplation of an absolutely perfect work of art. It is produced by "a multiplicity of symmetrical parts uniting in a consistent whole." As a great writer has said, it is "multitude in unity;" it is the result of the qualities of truth and reverence, and that which is untrue or irreverent can never be truly beautiful; therefore while perfection is not to be looked for in the Arena Chapel, truth and reverence are to be so strikingly found, that beauty follows as a needful consequence.

Let us now go into the choir, which is painted with the history of the Virgin, as is the larger chapel; but the scenes in which the story is told are far inferior in interest to those of Giotto, are deeper in colour, and are not marked by the same earnestness that distinguishes the master's work. Behind the altar is the tomb of the founder, who died in exile in Venice in 1320, but whose body was brought to Padua and buried in the chapel which he had erected.

Turn to the left and you will find yourself in the sacristy, and there you will see a statue of the same man standing under a Gothic niche with hands clasped and eyes raised, and dressed, not as a prince, but in the ordinary costume of the day. The inscription reads: "Propria figura Dominici Henrici Scrovegni militis de l'Arena."

CHAPTER II.

AFTER GIOTTO, AND THE WORK OF DONATELLO

TWO minutes' walk from this little Chapel of the Arena will take us to the Church of the Eremitani, which is an Augustinian church of the thirteenth century. In its great, simple nave, large in extent for preaching, you will find some interesting tombs that are worth attention. At the west end on the left is that of Jacopo Carrara, fifth sovereign lord of Padua, and on the right, his father, Ubertino, fourth lord.

These two tombs are practically all that is left of one of the greatest families of Padua, which provided for the city nine successive supreme rulers. As we stand before their tombs, it may be well to briefly review the history of the city.

I have already told you of the story of its origin, which can be dismissed as a myth, but we may start our survey from, say 450. At that time Padua was ruled by the Huns under the famous Attila. Then it fell under the rule of the Goths Odoacer and Theodoric, but was captured by the Greeks in 540.

A little later on the Goths, under Totila, took the place, but a second time it went back to the Byzantine Empire, being captured by Narses in 568. Then later on it became a Lombard city, rising in revolt against its Lombard king, Agilulph, and was recaptured by him, when it was severely damaged by fire and siege. After the Lombards came the Franks, and then in the eleventh century the city was, to a certain extent, independent, and ruling itself by a general council. Out of that grew as usual the competition of certain families for supreme control, the jealousy of other families, and the gradually increasing power of those who were able to accumulate wealth and influence, and the internecine warfare that always grew out of such competition. In about 1175 one of these families had come to the chief position, and the first podestà of the city was one of the great D'Este family. The rule of the podestà was but for a short time, and then Padua was united to the empire, and Ezzolino da Romano, of whom we have before heard, ruled the place as vicar for the emperor, and practised his vilest cruelties in it. He died in 1259, to the great satisfaction of the inhabitants, and then began another short period of independence and prosperity. At this time the city flourished and its power in arms also increased, and Vicenza became a dependence of Padua. Then its wealth and position attracted the attention of Can Grande I., ruler of Verona, and Padua was captured by him and became a dependence of Verona.

This only lasted till 1318, and then the bravery of the Paduans, who were led by the patriotic Jacopo da Carrara, freed the city from the yoke of Verona. Now commenced the Carrara period, as, in return for his skill and prowess, the citizens of Padua elected Jacopo to the post of lord of the city. From 1318 till 1405 — with the exception of two intervening years, 1388 and 1389, when Gian Galeazzo Visconti held the place — the Carrara family gave lords to Padua; but they have not left the signs of their rule, as did the family of the Scaligeri in the neighbouring city of Verona. The Carrara were a warlike race, constantly struggling to increase their boundaries and to capture the neighbouring cities, and there was great jealousy between them and the rulers of Verona and Vicenza. They were not an artistic family and they did not greatly beautify Padua, but they did give considerable assistance to learning, and the university flourished during their reign. There was also constant conflict between Padua and her great and powerful neighbour, the Republic of Venice. Unceasing warfare went on between these two rivals, Venice coveting the rule over prosperous Padua, and the Paduans fighting for their freedom. In 1405 the great Republic was the conqueror, and Francesco Carrara and his two sons were taken prisoners and were brought to Venice during the Dogedom of Michele Steno. In 1406, to the great disgrace of the Republic, the last rulers of Padua, independent sovereigns although they were, suffered death in the prisons of the Council of Ten by the orders of the dreaded Council of Three, and then Padua became an appanage of Venice and continued in that position till the fall of the Republic in 1797. It was ruled by Venetian nobles, a podestà, and a captain, and possessed a modified power of self-control with regard to internal affairs. It flourished more during this period than it had done under the Carrara family, as Venetian rule was fair although hard, and the Paduans became satisfied and happy under the fatherly regulations of the Republic.

We can gain an idea of the features of the Carrara rulers as we look at these tombs, as the faces are full of expressions of pride, and the monuments, each under its magnificent canopy, are impressive memorials of a great and powerful race.

There are other notable monuments in this church, especially a fine one on the left by Ammonati, erected in 1583 by orders of a professor of law, Benavides, who, not willing to leave to his successors the task of erecting his monument, had it put up during his lifetime. In the sacristy there is also an important monument to the painter, Paulus de Venetiis, 1429, in which the master is represented lecturing to his pupils, who are as old as himself, but only about a fourth of his size! The chief sight, however, in this church is not a tomb, but is to be seen in the second chapel to the right of the choir. Here are to be found some important frescoes by Mantegna, done when he was quite a young man.

We have already heard when in Milan of the founder of the Paduan school, Squarcione, and here in the Pinacoteca we shall see the only picture which is quite certainly by his hand. We have considered his influence and the powerful classical bend of his mind, and have seen how he gathered around him a school of younger men originating the Paduan school of artists.

Here is the work of his chief pupil, done doubtless during his pupilage, but revealing how great a genius he was to become. The love of classical art which was the passion of the master had descended to the scholar, but what a vast improvement is here to be seen over the rough, hard, stiff, angular work of Squarcione. The statuesque character which was derived from the study of the antique is also fully revealed, and the love of fine detail, which was a part of the art of Mantegna, but which he never allowed to overpower the bold effect of his conceptions. Mark the true perspective, the power, dignity, and, as a modern writer has well said, "the almost monumental grandeur of the single figures, and of the whole composition," and see how far in one short life the school has progressed from the very elemental work that characterized Squarcione.

In considering the Paduan school, of which such good examples are before us, we must not overlook the fact that there were earlier men painting in Padua than the Squarcionenesques. When in a few minutes we reach the great Church of St. Anthony, we can see the best work of two men already mentioned, Altichieri and D'Avanzi.

But besides these two there were others, notably Giusto da Padua and Guariento, who worked in the early fourteenth century; and ere we leave this church, in order to have an idea as to the beginning of Paduan art, we will step into the choir and see the work of Guariento. The frescoes are quaintly symbolical and allegorical, and then above these curious astrological pictures are others representing scenes from the life of St. Augustine. None of them are really beautiful, but they are rather quaint and odd, possessing their chief interest from the fact that they represent the beginnings of Paduan art before the classical element had come to take possession of it.

We will now leave this church and go to the middle of the city to see the Palazzo della Ragione, which I mentioned at the beginning of Chapter I.

This building, which is known to the Paduans as ** Il Salone, stands close to the university, and between the two piazze in which vegetables and fruit are sold. It was originally erected in the twelfth century, but has been repeatedly injured by fire. It forms one entire side of the Piazza dell' Erbe, stands completely upon open arches, and has a loggia around it. The great thing to see is the enormous hall up-stairs, and to reach it you go into the Via del Municipio and find an iron gate, at which is a porter who will gladly take you up many stairs into this enormous hall, which is said to be the largest in the world unsupported by pillars or arches. It is the work of Fra Giovanni, a friar who had been in India, and had there seen the roof of a huge palace which pleased him, and of which he made a careful design. The Paduans, desiring to erect some great work that should surpass anything done by their neighbours, commissioned him to roof their hall, which up to that time had consisted of three separate rooms with one gigantic roof, and the friar well accomplished his task. The room, which is hardly ever entered now save by visitors, contains the famous model made by Donatello for his equestrian statue which we shall see close to Il Santo, and the presence of this wooden model enables us to form a better idea of the size and proportions of the place than could otherwise have been possible. The walls were originally decorated by Giotto, but all his work perished in a fire which took place in 1410, and the present frescoes date from immediately after that fire, when the walls were restored and redecorated by the local artists of the time under the influence of the work of Giotto.

The frescoes are very curious and show how fond the Paduans have always been of astrology, a science which the influence of their important university no doubt helped to popularize. Here in these frescoes the astronomy of the day, which was in effect astrology, is well illustrated, and in combination with the stories of Holy Writ and the allegorical representations of the Elements, the Virtues, the Vices, and the Temperaments, are depicted all round the room in a certain strange confusion, the problems in astronomy being so arranged in position that successive seasons should illuminate them through the windows that are in the walls. At the entrance are two Egyptian statues that Belzoni, the celebrated discoverer, presented to his native town, and at the other end, towering up to the roof, is the gigantic model of the horse that Donatello prepared for his equestrian statue, and which is here carefully preserved. In some ways it is even finer than the statue of Gatta Melata which we are on our way to see, and by its very rugged grandeur and its strong sense of movement, power, and strength forms a most impressive object. We can inspect it at close quarters in this hall, and then in a few moments see high up above us near the church the statue itself, and be able to appreciate it from the position it was intended to occupy. The hall is altogether an imposing apartment, and is of such antiquity and such proportions that it is well worth the trouble of seeing.

Now we will move towards the other end of Padua to see the remarkable church of ** Il Santo, as strange a conglomeration of Oriental and Byzantine and pointed architecture as Europe can produce.

To the right of the west front stands the **bronze statue of Erasmo da Narni, called Gatta Melata, and one of the two supreme equestrian statues of the world, the other, of course, being the Colleone one at Venice, the work of Verrocchio. It is exceedingly fine, an incomparably magnificent work; both horse and horseman are admirably adapted one to the other. It is, as Hope Rea has said, "a magnificent presentation of a sagacious warrior, cool, determined, commanding, and is filled with that subtle suggestion of individual character which it is Donatello's special triumph to achieve."

The action of the horse is that of ambling, both feet on the same side moving together, and this action, as the same author points out, it has in common with the bronze horses of St. Mark's, and also with the horses on the frieze of the Parthenon. This was the ceremonial pace, specially fitted for serious occasions.

It was the first time in the Renaissance that such a statue was produced, and Donatello had nothing but the evidence of classic work and his own supreme powers to enable him to conquer all the difficulties that beset so great a problem. He began it in 1446 after completing the decorations of the altar of the church, and he completed it in 1453, having successfully studied the anatomy of the horse, conquered the difficulties of modelling so large and so imposing an object which was to be seen at a great height, and arranged for the casting of a huge mass of metal greater than had ever been used before.

According to tradition the church was the work of Niccolo da Pisa, who in the thirteenth century was called in by the Paduans to erect as fine a church to the memory of their great saint and to enclose his remains as could be built; but it is more than doubtful whether the great Pisan architect had anything to do with the building. As already stated, it is a strange mixture of styles, but has been built by some one who had an intimate acquaintance with

DONATELLO.—STATUE OF GATTA MELATA.

St. Mark's and who desired to give to his creation some unusual outré features that should recall that cathedral and yet give this church characteristics of its own. The eight cupolas do this most effectually, and the effect of the mingling of styles is not without its charm.

Near to the west front against the wall stands the tomb of Rolando Piazzola, a strenuous opponent of the Emperor Henry VII., when he strove to acquire the rights of the city and add it by force to the Holy Roman Empire. It is under a Gothic canopy of delightful simplicity.

Inside it is a very imposing edifice, and always crowded with people, who throng its many altars, especially the one dedicated to Il Santo where his body rests.

** The high altar was reconstructed in 1896 by Signor Camillo Boito, the then architect of the restoration, as a previous generation had removed it from its original position, taken it to pieces, and placed the reliefs that were made for it in different places. They are now all brought into their proper positions.

The angels playing on musical instruments form the front of the altar; above these are two reliefs of the miracles of the saint, two symbols of the evangelists, and a Pietà; and then again, higher up, are seven life-sized figures of saints, and in the midst a grand rugged crucifix. At the back of the altar are the two other reliefs of the miracles, two more symbols of the evangelists, and in the centre a large Entombment in terra-cotta which is in striking contrast to all the bronze and to the fine yellow marble in which the bronze panels are set. Perhaps the greatest works of all are the reliefs of the symbols of the evangelists, which are of remarkable beauty, splendidly drawn, especially the Ox and the Lion, full of decorative value, and of direct force and power.

The children who are in the twelve panels along the front of the altar are very important, and should all be studied. One of them is of that strange, half-childish, and half-mythical being that is special to Donatello, and had been conceived by him originally for the pulpit which he executed at Prato, but the others are simply delightful child angels playing on instruments, and created in masterly relief with great expression and charm.

Of the statues the St. Francis is by far the finest, a strong, vigorous, rugged figure, thoughtful, and not without a tenderness and sympathy of expression suitable to a representation of so loving a saint. The four reliefs depict celebrated scenes in the life of St. Anthony: the miracle of finding the miser's heart in his money chest; that of healing a young man who, in remorse for having struck his mother, had cut off his own foot; that of causing a newly born babe to speak and so establish the innocence of its mother; and finally, that of an ass who, though starving, recognized the sanctity of the Host and refused to eat it, and in this way convinced an unbeliever. In all of them there are powerful architectural backgrounds composed of rigid lines and well-filled spaces,—from which the characters of the stories which are presented stand out with expression that is quite remarkable in such minute work,—crowded with details of great beauty, but which are never allowed to confuse the main issue or to injure the decorative value of the panel. Restraint and reticence mark all the work, and a fine sense of decoration, with a perfect knowledge of what the material in which he worked was capable and wherein it would fail. In the centre is the superbly modelled crucifix, and behind it the strong, bold work in terracotta which is so pleasing as a foil to the bronze.

Now let me take you into the chapel which is opposite that of St. Anthony, and which is decorated with fresco-work by Altichieri and D'Avanzi. It is called ** the Capella San Felice, and having been originally dedicated to St. James, has his story in fresco by these interesting early Paduan artists on its walls. There are two tombs in this chapel, one to the wife of the second lord of Padua, Marsilio Carrara, and the other to the founder of the chapel; but all the remaining space is covered with the decoration forming what Crowe called "the noblest monument of the pictorial art of the fourteenth century." It will be well for you to inspect all the pictures in this series, some of which are taken from the legendary life and some from the Scriptural story relating to St. James, and mark how these followers of Giotto have developed the dramatic power; how well the story is told and with what simple force and directness, and also how much deeper and richer are the colours used, and what a fine decorative effect is obtained.

Both artists appear to have worked together on this chapel, but the work of D'Avanzi can be distinguished from that of his friend by its greater minuteness of detail, and by the striking way in which he distinguishes faces one from the other, giving to each a character of its own. Altichieri is considered to be the greater artist of the two, and to be the better and more skilful draughtsman, but his companion evidently had not only the greater insight into character, but the greater power to represent such character in his work. They are, of course, followers of Giotto in the way in which, with an absence of accessories and with a plain simple truth, they narrate their story; always keeping in view the final result as a piece of decoration as well as a pictured narrative. They are strikingly original in their ideas, and you will mark, having so recently come from the Arena Chapel, what progress these frescoes show in knowledge of atmosphere, movement, proportion, and height of figure, and in composition and grouping.

It would, I think, be well for you as soon as you have seen these frescoes to leave the church, step outside the main door, pass around one side of the square on the left to a door leading you into the Capella San Giorgio, the key of which the custode of Il Santo will produce, and look at the work of these same two artists which covers the walls of this chapel. Here you will find the story of St. George, together with scenes from the lives of St. Catherine and St. Lucy, and some New Testament subjects. Behind the altar is the Crucifixion, and above it the Coronation of the Virgin, and close to them, on the left wall, a fine picture in which are members of the family of the founder of the chapel kneeling before the Madonna. These frescoes were done some five years later than those at which we have just been looking, and mark still further progress. The Crucifixion is far finer than the one in the Capella San Felice, as there is more expression in the faces, a clear desire to give a supernatural aspect to the scene, and a greater realization of the ability to group the figures in a natural manner, and give each its part clearly in the central event of the picture. There is not the poetry that Giotto possessed in so supreme a degree, but there is more dramatic force. There is not the intense feeling of devotion, the deep religious spirit, the nervous trembling of excitement born of profound belief which is characteristic of Giotto, but there is a reaching out to greater pictorial effect, a desire to render the scene as it actually was, and to paint each spectator as he actually looked, and there is power and skill in modelling, in painting draperies, and in arranging shadows that is very noticeable. Many of the frescoes are in bad condition, others are in good preservation; but all are worth attention, and mark another milestone in the progress of Paduan art.

Let us now return to the church, and turn to the Capella del Santo. It is a sixteenth-century chapel, partly the work of Sansovino, and is very richly decorated; but nothing that it contains is of a specially high merit in the kingdom of art. You will always find this chapel full of worshippers, as the Paduans are a very religious people and devoted to the cult of their saint, whose remains lie in the altar by the side of which stand two fine silver candelabra, good fifteenth-century work by the hands of a local artist, Parodi.

There is a fine tomb against the second column to the right in the nave; and in the third chapel on the same side there is a tabernacle, covered with reliefs by Donatello, which is often overlooked, and in which also the fine gates and two grand red marble tombs should be noted.

In the sacristy there is some beautiful intarsia work which is well worth seeing, and if you can get the cupboards opened, some splendid vestments and some fine examples of the goldsmith's art are to be seen; and then in the cloisters close by there are more fine tombs.

From the cloisters you gain a charming view of the church, and can decide whether you agree with a numerous body of writers who speak of it as ugly and bizarre, or whether you agree with many other writers, with whom I must confess to have more sympathy, who regard it as an interesting and original work, which is impressive, strange, and quaint and attractive from its very originality and from the contrast it affords to the usual type of buildings, and is a high tribute to the genius of its architect.

CHAPTER III.

OTHER SIGHTS AND THE PICTURE - GALLERY

THERE are not many other churches to be seen in Padua. The cathedral has no special features, and the tombs and pictures that it contains are not of much importance. The baptistery is a more interesting building as it is thirteenth-century Lombard work, and recalls a similar one at Parma, which, however, is finer, and has the advantage of being better placed. This baptistery loses dignity from being so close to the Duomo. Its interior is impressive, as it is entirely covered with frescoes, which are the work of two other early Paduan artists, Giovanni and Antonio da Padua, of whom little is known, and whose chief works are these frescoes. Their date is about 1370, and they were painted at the cost of Fina Buzzacarina, wife of the ruler of the city, Francesco Carrara, and represent stories from the Old and New Testaments depicted in a very quaint, naïve manner, very dark and rich in effect.

The only other really important church to be seen is that of Santa Giustina, at the extreme south of the city, not a great way from Il Santo, and situated close to the delightful Piazza Vittorio Emanuele. This large open space, which must be passed to reach the church, has a lake in the middle surrounded by trees and crossed by a bridge, and around it are a number of statues of those important persons who can be said to have any connection with Padua, or were educated at its university. The Church of Santa Giustina is built above some catacombs in which are the remains of early Christian martyrs, SS. Giustina, Prosdocimo, and Daniel, and there are some curious altar fronts and other pieces of carving to be seen in them. The choir contains some excellent woodwork which forms the stalls, and in the inner choir, which belongs to a far older building, are other carved wood stalls decorated with unusual and remarkable intarsia work.

When you leave this church I want you to follow the method that we adopted at Verona and see a garden, but this time not for a magnificent view, but for a different reason. In Padua is the most ancient * Botanical Garden in Europe, one which was arranged in 1543 and which has belonged to the great University of Padua ever since, and has had connected with it some of the most eminent botanists in the world. It was founded by the Republic of Venice, and from it sprang all the other botanical gardens which have been so important in acclimatizing exotic trees in Europe and in helping on the study of botany. It is close to the church and known as the Orto Botanico, and well worth visiting. There are many plants in it that will interest you only if you happen to be a botanist, but the garden is so lovely and the majority of the trees and shrubs are in such fine condition and so well grown, that I am sure you would enjoy a stroll through its walks.

The grandest tree is a magnificent palm, which is enclosed in a house by itself, but there are many other fine exotic trees with which we are now familiar, but which were introduced into Europe early in the eighteenth century, first planted here, and thence have spread in all directions. The groups of medicinal plants are also worth attention, and in the long building near the garden is a very complete botanical museum and herbarium. Admission is free, but it is well to give one of the gardeners a gratuity when you leave the place. To obtain admission, you will have to pull the bell at the gate, and to go out you will need to do the same, as the gates are locked behind you when you have entered, to prevent — so the custodian informed me — the entrance of tramps or dogs. You will probably find only half a dozen students in the place, and have it pretty much to yourself.

The university, which the Paduans always speak of as Il Bo from the sign of the ancient tavern, the Ox, on which the original buildings were erected, does not contain much that will interest you. In the entrance court you will notice, as you will see with better effect in Bologna, the arms of the various students, dating away back to the fifteenth century; and in the museums, if you are disposed to pay them a visit, you will find all the ordinary collections that such museums possess, and notably a fine collection of local fossils, and a superb series of Roman coins. But I think that the picture-gallery will be found of greater importance than the museums, especially as when we arrive in Bologna it will be advisable to spend more time than has been hitherto given to museums in the very fine one in that city.

To the Pinacoteca let us therefore go. It is close to Il Santo, and not five minutes' walk from the Botanical Garden.

There is not any catalogue to be obtained, but one is in preparation, and, as usual in Italian galleries, the pictures are "in course of arrangement." You will get accustomed to this expression as you go through Italian galleries, as there is a mania for rearranging galleries and preparing new catalogues. If only the work were to be done by those persons who really understand pictures, or with the advice of such experts as Doctor Frizzoni, Mr. Berenson, Doctor Ricci, Mr. Cook, or Professor Venturi, the result would be delightful, but in many cases the work is left to the custodian of the gallery, who often has not had either the requisite experience or the needful knowledge to name and arrange his gallery in an accurate manner.

There are five pictures in Room I. that merit attention. 50 and 56, which are on either side of the door, and which were originally numbered 416 and 417, are the fronts of two cassone or marriage chests, the other portions of which, having no decoration upon them, I found in an adjoining store-room in pieces. They are attributed to Giorgione, and I think with good reason, and represent scenes connected with the legends of Adonis.<sup>1</sup>

They are delightfully painted, are splendid in colour, and full of sunny effect very characteristic of the great master, while to those who know his pictures, the trees, the distant hills, the grouping of the figures, and their very forms will be eloquent of that versatile genius. There are two other panels by Giorgione in this same gallery also representing mythological scenes, one of them being Leda and the Swan, but although they are numbered 42 and 43, I cannot tell you in which room to find them, as at the time of my visit they were on the floor with their faces turned to the wall, and the attendant seemed to have no idea as to where they were to be hung. In many ways they recall the cassone panels, as the landscape in them is most beautifully painted, although on a very minute scale. They are gems of loveliness, and the figures of the man and woman in the second one are charmingly idyllic and naïve in their sentiment, very characteristic of the lyrical manner of Giorgione.<sup>1</sup>

33 is a good picture by Marco Basaiti, a most interesting Venetian master, of whom very little is known save that he was a follower of Vivarini. It represents the Madonna and Child with St. Peter and St. Liberale and three angels, and is signed Marcivs Baxaiti. The saint has been called St. George and also St. Paul, but I think there is little doubt that it represents Giorgione's favourite saint, St. Liberale.

The Palma Vecchio, of a Madonna and Child with two donors, although provided with a signature, must not be accepted as a genuine work by that master. It is a counterpart, as Morelli first pointed out, of a picture at Berlin, equally untrustworthy, and is only a school work, and is, I believe, so labelled at the present time.

49 is a delightful picture of a Virgin and Child with St. John the Baptist and a donor, evidently a work of the school of Lotto, but not by Lotto himself. It was at one time numbered 116. There are also some works of early Venetian art of the Vivarini school in this room that are worth attention.

In Room II. are two works by Bonifacio Veronese, a Nativity, 166, and a Madonna and Child with SS. John the Baptist, Sebastian, Jerome, and Francis, decorative pictures with rich voluptuous colouring.

In Room III. there is nothing worth attention.

Room IV. contains the most interesting picture in the collection, 399, the altar-piece in five divisions with SS. Lucia, John the Baptist, Jerome, Anthony, and Giustina, each in their own niche, and with a rough landscape behind, which is the work of Squarcione. It has been much injured, and has also been in places repainted, but it is of extraordinary interest as marking the very beginning of the true Paduan school, hard, classical, rude, but possessed of much dignity and reserve, and delightful in its statuesque pose and in its charm of colour.

Near to it is 381 (once called 781), a school picture of just the same period, in which it is probable the master had a hand also. It is more stiff and formal, and is an Adoration with St. John the Baptist and St. Jerome. Possibly both works were done for an altar dedicated to St. Jerome, as he appears so prominently in each.

Another early Paduan work is 385 (or 1216) in which again St. Jerome is an important figure.

397 is a fine work by one of the Vivarini, and around it are two panels belonging to it. The St. Peter is a grand figure with a fine head, and the draperies, tiara, and keys are superbly painted. It is a charming piece of work of the rigid, hard Crivellian school.

In Room V. neither of the Bellinis must be accepted as works by the masters whose names are attached to them, although both are Venetian pictures of good merit. 415 (1273) bears the name of Jacopo and 425 (658) the name of Gentile. The former is clearly by Rondinelli.

GIORGIONE (?). — PORTRAIT OF A YOUTH.

439 is a fine head by Antonello da Messina, and there are two terribly sickly works in this room by Sassoferato, over which the custodian goes into raptures, and which are sentimental to the last degree.

In Room VI. there is a very attractive Portrait, 454 (659), of a youth, which has been for years attributed to Giorgione, and has a signature to that effect upon it which may or may not be false. It is now generally given to Torbido, and so close is the resemblance of the face to that of the Shepherd Boy at Hampton Court which has been called the work of Giorgione, that Mr. Cook, in refusing to accept the latter as by Giorgione, draws special attention to the resemblance, and is disposed to attribute each work to the hand of Torbido. I must confess that it goes hard with me to resign the Shepherd Boy as a genuine work by Giorgione, and my own feeling is rather that in this head of a youth we have the fifth work by Giorgione that the Paduan gallery possesses, rather than a work by Torbido. It came originally from the Church of Santa Giustina, and while there was always known as a picture by Giorgione. It was given to the church by a Venetian lady under his name, so I was told at the church, and perhaps some day a search amongst the papers of the church will reveal some further information as to this very interesting portrait, and the question, not only of its identity, but also of that of the Hampton Court picture which it so closely resembles, may be set at rest.

I am disposed to think that this very youth can be recognized as seated under a tree, in the cassone front by Giorgione (56) which we saw in Room I.

There is an interesting Garofalo (710) in this room, very Ferrarese in its trees and buildings, somewhat cold in its colour for this master, and having in one corner a mysterious scene which appears to resemble a man struck by lightning, and which should be the means of revealing the history of the picture, which was very likely a votive altar-piece.

You should also see in this room two fine old frames, one of which encloses the Boccaccino, which is itself rather a good picture.

We now enter the big room at the end of the gallery.

Right at the end of it is a glorious Roma-

nino, a superb picture. The Virgin is being crowned by three angels above, while below are grouped SS. Benedict and Giustina on the right, SS. Prosdocimo and Scholastica on the left, and below the throne seated on the step is a lovely child angel playing on a tambourine. A Pietà and four saints are above the altarpiece in a lunette, and the predella contains a charming tondo of the Holy Innocents and two saints. It is fully signed and dated, and was originally in the Church of Sta. Giustina, and is perhaps the very finest picture that Romanino ever painted, full of rich vibrating colour and superbly arranged.

765, near to it, is also by Romanino, and came from the same church. It represents the Madonna and Child with St. Benedict and St. Giustina and a lovely angel, and is also very rich and deep in colour.

A rather interesting picture in this gallery is a copy, by Longhi, of the Francia at Ravenna, which he has signed and passed off as his own!!

Finally, the fresco by Girolamo da Santa Croce is worth attention, and is another picture from Sta. Giustina, in which the saint is seen with St. Benedict. The master is better known for his copies of the work of Cima than for his own, which are not of striking importance, but of which this is one of the best that I know.

CHAPTER I.

ETRUSCAN AND ROMAN TIMES

BOLOGNA was originally an Etruscan city, and evidence of its importance in Etruscan times can still be seen in the place. In the middle ages it was an independent city, governing itself and giving much attention to the erection of important buildings, and to the strengthening of its position. It was a powerful city as it increased in prosperity, and was a serious enemy in the field. As we shall see later on, it had some great successes in warfare. In the fourteenth century it was attached to the Holy See, and from that time was ruled nominally by the representatives of the Pope. The Bentivoglio family, however, obtained such large wealth and power as practically to make them into independent princes, and under the rule of Giovanni Bentivoglio, who reigned for some forty years, the city flourished and became an important place for the cultivation of the liberal arts. The desire of Giovanni Bentivoglio was to adorn and beautify his city, and to attract to it the greatest craftsmen of the times; but he was a despotic ruler, and raised a great deal of bitter feeling against him in the place. His tyranny and independence became at last so serious that Pope Julius II. came against the city, drove him out, reinstated the papal power, and ruled the place by legates who were more directly responsible to the Holy See. Bentivoglio fled to Milan, and to prevent his return the exasperated people destroyed his palace, and many buildings that were important in the city.

From the time of Julius II. the place remained attached to the Patrimony of Peter and was ruled from Rome until the events of recent times.

In considering the history of Bologna we have to deal with a state of civilization far earlier than that of the Romans, and the oldest that has yet come under our attention. The history of the Etruscan nation is still very largely a matter of mystery. We do not know for certain whence came the people who spread over Italy, and whose twelve cities acquired so great a renown.

We cannot yet read with an absolute knowledge or accuracy the inscriptions that the Etruscans have left behind them in such vast numbers, nor can we always interpret to our complete satisfaction the legends on the tombstones that are found, or the writing within the tombs. Many mysteries still surround this most interesting people, chief amongst them being the difficulty of their language; as we have yet to discover such a memorial as the Rosetta stone, which proved in the case of the Egyptian hieroglyphics the long sought for key to the mystery.

Some day, perhaps, we may find some similar treasure, written in the quaint Runic characters of Etruria, which will once for all settle the disputes over the meaning of those inscriptions that now afford so much scope for discussion.

We have plenty of evidence as to the life and habits of the Etruscans, thanks to the discoveries that have been made, and especially to the treasures that have been found in their great cemeteries and in their graves. The museums of Perugia, Chiusi, and Bologna enable the student to realize how rich a nation Etruria must have been, and in what a high state of civilization and luxury her people lived. Their artistic knowledge must have been very considerable. Their jewelry, bronzes, and vases show great beauty both of design and workmanship, and the vast numbers of ornaments that are found testify to the love of decoration that characterized this interesting people. There is nothing barbaric about their work. It shows a pure love of design, a refinement that is Greek in its nature, and a delicacy of workmanship that is surprising. Especially careful they seem to have been with their dead, and very particular as to preparing fine tombs for them, decorating the interiors with important sculpture and fresco decoration of a rude sort, and then burying with the dead, money, ornaments, jewels, and vessels of various kinds for their use in some unknown region, which now enable us to understand somewhat of the habits and customs of the nation.

In the ** Museo Civico, to which it is well that we should make our first visit in Bologna, we shall find in the tenth room a magnificent collection of Etruscan remains. The room is a very long one, finely arranged and well lighted, and is filled with what has been discovered near to Bologna. Here we can see the graves as they were opened, and the arrangement of them can be studied, whilst in cases around are the treasures that have been taken from this gigantic cemetery. There are vases of considerable beauty, bronze ornaments, notably mirrors, of the most exquisite design, sometimes covered with dainty engraving and at other times inlaid with metals, such as silver. There are brooches, fibulæ, rings for the finger and ears, in gold, silver, and bronze; there are ornaments of all varieties in glass, often very lovely in colour, and varied in effect by mottling, cloudiness, clearness, or device. Necklaces are to be seen in plenty, and important collars in silver and gold. There are bronze vessels of all kinds, both for domestic and for sacrificial use, and some of the bronze jars are covered with delightful chased work, depicting scenes from the history of the people. Tombstones stand all around the room, many of them covered with strange inscriptions which have only been partially deciphered; and altogether there is such an effect of wealth and prosperity as enables us to better appreciate the genius of the Etruscans, and to realize how great a nation possessed the soil upon which we now stand way back in the mysterious days preceding the foundation of Rome.

The old names for Bologna, Felsina, which is still used on books, and for scents and soaps used in the city, and Bononia, which survives in legal documents, and was used by the artists of the Renaissance, were said to have been derived from the Etruscan rulers who founded the place and gave to it their names. Another interpretation of the word Bononia derives it from a certain ruler in Roman times; but in any case it has a considerable antiquity.

Of actual Roman remains in the city there are not very many, but in this same museum can be seen plenty of evidence as to the Roman occupation of the place. In the entrance-hall may be found some Roman tombs and statues, also a collection of pieces of terra-cotta, with remains of mosaic decorations and portions of columns of various buildings. There is a series of fine mile-stones from the great roads that lay through Bologna; and other stones on which are to be found records as to the movements of certain legions and the places where they were stationed in the neighbourhood. Up-stairs, in Room IX., can be seen some objects in glass and bronze, with candelabra, statuettes, and ornaments that were found in the neighbourhood of the city, together with a great variety of other Roman objects that have no immediate connection with Bologna.

In the city there are only two important things which relate to Roman Bologna. One is the great Piazza, around which are grouped the chief buildings, and which occupies the site of the Roman forum, and has been constantly called in mediæval times "The Forum," although, save that it is an open space and has always been so, it retains little trace of its original occupation. The other remains are to be found in various places in the ancient Church of San Stefano, which is the oldest church in the city, and which was built, so historians say, upon the site of a Roman temple, and has incorporated into its structure various pieces of undoubted Roman work.

We know that the terms of the second triumvirate, 43 b. c., were settled in Bologna, that Antony and Octavius Lepidus visited the place, that it was a seat for a time of the imperial power, and that, during the Second Empire, it was a favourite residence of the emperor and court, and that four hundred years after Christ it resisted the attacks of Alaric the Goth, who was defeated by the Roman forces at its gates. But of all this stirring time we have hardly a stone in its place to remind us, and little, save the portions of the old Roman walls and bits of the fortifications around the city, still stands as a memorial of Roman Bologna.

Of Lombard times there is little more to be seen.

The only important relic that stands to tell us of those early times is the font in the centre of what is called the Atrio di Pilato, which forms one of that curious assemblage of churches under one roof which is now termed San Stefano, and which we shall visit presently. It bears the name of a Lombard king, Luitprand, who lived in 744. Beside it there are some columns in another of these churches, called Santa Trinita, which are Lombard, and in all probability yet another church under the same roof, called San Sepolcro, preserves the shape and appearance and is built upon the site of a Lombard erection.

We then have to make a big stride to the middle ages, when Bologna became an important independent free city, having been governing itself from 960, with more or less freedom, and growing rapidly into a strong powerful place.

** San Stefano, to which already so much reference has been made, is so strange an agglomeration of churches and so ancient in its building, that there perhaps something can be learned of the very earliest work in Bologna in the middle ages.

The leaning towers are the most notable objects in a general view of the city, and close to them branch out five great streets, and the church is in one of these five — the Via San Stefano.

The first church which we enter is comparatively uninteresting, and is called the Crocifisso Church. The only thing worth noting in it is the pulpit, which is twelfth-century work. From this church we enter a sort of enclosed passage, which has been arranged so as to form a separate church, called the Capella della Consolazione, and then go down some steps, into a crypt under the Church of the Crocifisso called the Confessione, which is of eleventh or twelfth century work. The cloister close by this church is very charming, and the upper gallery is supported by twelfth-century round arches or twin columns.

The next church to be entered is that of Santa Trinita, which is also twelfth-century work, Lombard in style, and has very ancient columns in it. Thence we pass into an open court around which is a colonnade, and in the centre of which is the font already named, which bears the name of Luitprand upon it. It is called the Atrio di Pilato, and on the left is an enclosed chapel containing a fine picture by Giacomo Francia, the son of the great Francia, and a very remarkable crucifix; painted in 1370, by Simone da Bologna, an artist who devoted the best of his energies and almost all his time to painting such objects of devotion. From this court opens out another small chapel called the Hall of the Lombards, in which are preserved the keys of the City of Imola, captured by the Bolognese in the year 1328.

Leaving this church, a step takes us into another church, called San Sepolcro, which is a still earlier building going back to the tenth century, and in which, a hundred years later, San Petronio was buried in a tomb copied from the holy sepulchre at Jerusalem. This church is circular, as were so many of these very early ones, and is supported by seven columns, which are said to have belonged to the temple which originally stood on the site, and to have been left in their original position when the church was first erected. The brick column which now stands in front of each was added in the twelfth century or thereabouts. The walls are of brick and the whole structure has been but little altered since its original erection. Some of the columns are of great beauty.

Lastly we enter the Church of SS. Peter and Paul, another twelfth-century church, in which can be found many portions of Roman work that belonged to the original temple. This quaint, dark church contains the tombs of two saints, martyrs, St. Vitalis and St. Agricola, in very early sarcophagi, which are probably contemporary with their martyrdom in the ninth century. It has also the iron processional cross of the saints which is upon the wall to the right, and on some of the columns can be found portions of curious fresco-work. A fine altar-piece by Lorenzo Costa stands in it at present, and the windows should be noticed, as they are composed of transparent marble. It is now only used as a mortuary chapel.

This is altogether a strange and somewhat bewildering assemblage of buildings, all clustered together and one leading out of the other, built upon a sacred site, and containing among them almost all that remains of the very earliest history of the city.

CHAPTER II.

ITS DAYS OF INDEPENDENCE

THE history of Bologna during the middle ages is bound up with that of the struggle between the Guelphs and Ghibellines, in which the city remained constant to the Guelph side throughout.

A reference has already been made to this warfare on page 28 and it involved a struggle between the powers of the Church and those of the empire. Bologna had always been a devoted daughter of the Church, and her sons were noted for their religious fervour. The characteristic still remains, and in Bologna will now be found a strong attachment to the Holy See and a devotion of exceptional importance among the people. At the same time it has always prided itself upon a strict observance of its motto of "Libertas;" has been advanced and intellectual, and able to reconcile with a clear opinion and freedom of self-government in local affairs a deep attachment in matters spiritual to the supreme pontiff. Its tenacity in the support of the Guelphic cause led to serious warfare, which continued for a long space. One of the greatest battles ever fought between the rival forces was fought near Bologna in 1249, and the commander was one Filippo, who was podestà of Bologna. The natural son of the emperor, King Enzio of Sardinia, was in command of the Imperial forces, and when the Ghibellines were defeated he fell into the hands of the people of Bologna, who carried him in triumph to their city, lodged him in the Palazzo del Podestà, and although they treated him well as a royal prince, kept him there a prisoner for twenty-two years, refusing with the haughtiest disdain all offers for ransom made by the emperor his father. At his death in 1272 they gave him a place of sepulture in their most sacred spot, the Church of St. Dominic.

Few things so pleased the Bolognese as this capture of King Enzio, and their ability to retain their royal prisoner despite all the efforts of the emperor and his allies to have him released. For many years after the death of the king, the people of Bologna continued to boast of their power and prowess, and on the monument that was erected over his tomb they congratulated themselves in the most amusing manner over their skill and determination.

Later on in the thirteenth century the state of confusion into which Bologna had come, owing to the pride of her people and the constant conflict between her chief families for supreme controlling power, led to her losing the complete independence upon which she had prided herself, for the more important adherents of the Guelph party, fearing that the city would be torn asunder in the struggle and lose all its position, appealed to the Holy See to declare a definite supremacy over it. This was done by Pope Nicholas III., who visited the place in 1277, reconciled the rival parties, and was accepted as overlord by the populace, who gave him a very hearty welcome.

Bologna was then ruled by papal legates, and this rule continued in name down to 1506, although the later rulers of the Visconti and Bentivogli families considered their position more than that of supreme and hereditary sovereigns than as vicars for the Holy See, which they actually were, until Pope Julius II. gave them very clearly to understand their rightful position.

In our consideration of the long period that is included in the course of events just stated it is well to commence with the two leaning towers that dominate the city, and which are such strange and prominent objects in the landscape. The reason for their erection is not known, but the Bolognese historians attribute them to the pride of certain great families who desired to raise these edifices that they might stand for ever and commemorate the power and wealth of their builders. The taller tower was started in the early twelfth century by the Asinelli family, the smaller one by three brothers — Filippo, Oddo, and Marco Garisenda — at about the same time. They may have been built as belfries, or it may have been intended to attach to each of them some great palace to which they should act as campaniles, but in all probability they were no more than triumphal monuments, erected to show the dignity and vast means of those who built them in competition with each other. Probably they were intended to be encased in marble, as were the western fronts of so many churches in Italy, but the cost was found too great, or the builders died before the completion of the work, and their successors did not feel inclined to waste more money upon them. I do not recommend you to climb the stairs in order to obtain the view, as although the sight is extensive and varied, the effort to gain the top is a serious one, and the result is not commensurate with the pains. As outlooks in time of warfare they were no doubt very useful, and probably the original idea of their erection arose in that way. Their inclination took place early in the history of their erection, possibly as the result of an earthquake, or by reason of the loose character of the soil or the insufficiency of the foundations, and the builders tried to rectify it as their work progressed, and eventually, finding that it was not serious, carried up the tower as high as they could, preventing the inclination from increasing by various ingenious devices in the brickwork on the opposite side to that on which it leaned.

The other great tower in Bologna, that which crowns the Palazzo del Podestà, was erected for another purpose, having been built, when the first attempt was made to rescue King Enzio, in order that a sharp lookout might be kept and the safety of the illustrious prisoner ensured.

The foundation of most of the churches of Bologna belongs to the thirteenth century, that of San Petronio, the largest, being a hundred years later in date.

The Church of San Domenico is, perhaps, the most important one in the city, and its foundation belongs to the period just named; but it has been so altered, restored, and practically rebuilt, that it is difficult to discover anything in it that belongs to the original structure. On our way to it, we shall mark the two fine tombs that stand out in the piazza, and the two statues near to them. The statues of the Blessed Virgin and of St. Dominic are seventeenth-century work, but the tombs belong to a much earlier period.

They are both of them thirteenth-century work, and were erected to the memory of important citizens of the city.

The one near to the church, in which the sarcophagus rests under an elegant colonnade, supported in its turn by a series of fine columns and crowned with a pyramidal roof, belongs to one Roland Passagieri, who in 1250 was head of the notaries of the place, and who was selected to write the letter to the emperor in reply to the one which he sent to Bologna imperiously demanding the release of his son Enzio. It was mainly on the advice of this Roland that the citizens determined to show their power by retaining the king as their prisoner, and he was selected to convey to the emperor their decision, which he did in a letter so strong and haughty in its expressions, and withal so well expressed, that it was quoted by many writers of his day with approval as a model of what such a letter should be.

The citizens, feeling that Roland had given to their city an added lustre of glory and dignity, gave to his remains a magnificent funeral, and buried him in a prominent position, erecting over his burial-place this delightful monument.

The other similar tomb, which stands near to the house in which the deceased person resided and which is plainer in its structure, was erected a little later to another notary who appears to have been a friend of the great Roland and his successor in office, and who was a member of the noble house of Foscherari.

On entering the church proceed at once to the large chapel on the right, which contains the ** Arca di San Domenico, one of the greatest works of Niccolo da Pisano.

St. Dominic died in Bologna, and when he was canonized his bones were translated to this church, and placed in the sarcophagus which the great Niccolo and his pupils had sculptured for the purpose, and the subjects of which are the chief miracles attributed to the saint. The actual "arca" only is his work and that of his pupil; the predella carvings and the canopy were added three hundred years later. As an early work of the great master, the sarcophagus is well worth careful attention, as it marks the commencement of a new spirit in art, and the beginning of that movement which had its full fruit in the great pulpits in Pisa and Siena, and in all the varied sculpture of Giovanni and Andrea di Pisano, who followed the great Niccolo. There is a dignity and force in the reliefs on this tomb, and a graphic power of telling the story that is not to be seen in the later works by Alfonso Lombardi, which were added in 1532. The kneeling angels in front are of different date. That on the left is by Niccolo dell' Arca, who also did the wreaths of fruit held by the children on the canopy, and derived his sobriquet from his success with this work; while that on the right is said to be an early work of Michelangelo, who also carved the figure above of San Petronio holding the church in his hand. These figures betray none of the fiery spirit of the master, nor none of his paganism, and if they are his work at all, they belong to the very beginning of his career.

NICCOLO DA PISANO.—ARCADI SAN DOMENICO

It is known that Buonarotti was in Bologna when Pope Julius II. entered it in triumph, but this sculpture belongs to an earlier period than that, and there is but little evidence to connect it with the great Florentine.

Above the tomb can be seen a fine fresco by Guido Reni, one of the really impressive works of this invertebrate artist, whose huge creations, spread over such vast spaces, are to be found in profusion in his native city, and who is buried in this very church.

The other important sight to be seen in this church, when a careful attention has been given to the reliefs on the tomb of St. Dominic, consists of the stalls in the choir, which are the work of two Dominican friars, Fra Damiano da Bergamo and Fra Antonio Asinelli, the latter a member of the family who built one of the leaning towers.

They were carved and inlaid in the sixteenth century, and the intarsia work, representing a cycle of scenes from Scripture, is of the highest merit and excellence.

The same two friars worked in the sacristy, inlaying the entrance door and the cupboards in which the vestments are kept; and they are said also to have carved the two statues of the Virgin and St. Dominic, although, if the inscription on one of them is to be accepted, they were made from a tree planted by St. Dominic himself, and therefore may well have been made long before the period of these two good friars.

Near to the choir, in a chapel to the right, is to be found a very fine * picture by Filippino Lippi, representing the Marriage of St. Catherine, and signed and dated 1501. It was painted for the donor of the picture, who is to be seen in one of the corners of it.

The ** silver reliquary in which the head of St. Dominic is preserved was made in 1373, and is of considerable beauty, the chasing, which represents scenes from the life of the saint, being remarkably fine, but this treasure is so seldom to be seen that it is useless to describe it. Only once a year can it be exhibited, and even then it is not easy to come sufficiently near to it to be able to appreciate its beauties, and only the production of letters of introduction from the highest of ecclesiastical authorities will obtain for the visitor a special view of the relic and its silver shrine.

One more thing must be noted before leaving this church, and that is, in the left transept, opposite to the tomb of King Enzio, a portrait of St. Thomas Aquinas by Simone da Bologna, which it is authoritatively stated is an actual likeness of the saint painted from a lost original some eighty years after the death of St. Thomas, and retained in this church ever since.

We will now leave the Church of San Domenico and return to the Piazza, or Forum, already mentioned. It is one of the most impressive squares in Italy and contains some remarkable buildings.

Adjacent to it is the Piazza di Nettune, containing a fine fountain, which was first erected in about 1560 when San Carlo Borromeo was legate for the Pope in the city, and was one of those beneficent works that the great cardinal was so fond of initiating. The Church of San Petronio, which has never been completed and is only a portion of what was intended to be built, occupies an important position in the piazza, and opposite to it is the Palazzo del Podestà, where Enzio was confined and in which, in 1410, the conclave met when Pope John XXIII. was elected. The great hall upstairs is now used sometimes as a market-hall, and often for local exhibitions. In this building Roland carried on his duties, and here still do the notaries meet in their own room, in which are contained many of their records, others having been removed to the library. Here are preserved a vast quantity of papers which can, I am able to testify, yield information of the greatest importance as to Bologna, and which would well repay a systematic examination.

On the left, as one stands in the square facing San Petronio, is the impressive Palazzo Comunale, over the entrance of which stands the bronze statue which really represents Pope Gregory XII., who was a native of the place, but which has been turned into a figure of San Petronio in order to save the figure from the destructive mob who ruled the city during the revolution of 1796. The building is used as a government office, and its architecture is composed of a great variety of styles, as it has been so altered from time to time that little of its original pointed work remains. There is nothing of consequence to be seen inside, save a fresco by Francia, which can be seen another day when considering the art of that great artist.

Opposite to this Palazzo Comunale is a fine portico or colonnade known as the Portico de' Banchi, which is passed on the way to the Museo Civico. The next door beyond the Museo is the Archiginnasio.

This was the original university building, although not the first place in which the edu-tion for which Bologna has always been famous was taught. Long before the sixteenth century Bologna had a learned university, but did not possess any central building in which the work could be carried on, and it was therefore conducted in separate detached rooms taken in different houses throughout the city by the professors. In 1562 Cardinal Carlo Borromeo, to whom not only Bologna but so many other towns in Tuscany owe great privileges, being papal legate in the place, found that a grievous state of affairs existed, owing to the want of a central college; and he erected this Archiginnasio, and placed all the professors in it. Here was the important work of education carried on till the seventeenth century, but the chief rooms are now filled with the fine library, known as the Biblioteca Comunale, admission to which, if you are a student, can easily be obtained. This delightful building is worth visiting, however, in order to see the many thousand of coats of arms, which are the heraldic achievements of the past students and professors, and which seem to cover every available space on its walls and galleries, producing a remarkable and quaint decorative effect.

There are the remains of the college chapel to be seen opening out of the court, the walls and ceiling of which are covered with fresco-work by a local artist of the late sixteenth century; but it is the arms which are spread about in all directions that are the sight of the place, and some of them are so well painted as to be works of art of considerable importance.

Now let us return to the square, mount the flight of steps, and enter San Petronio.

We have here an unfinished fourteenth-century church, the chief building that was started in the days when Bologna was free. If completed it would have been a most imposing building, but one quite out of proportion with the importance of the city, as the interior contains only the nave and two aisles; and the church was to have been extended very much farther, with a chancel, sanctuary, and lady-chapel, and to have had north and south transepts on each side.

The work of its erection was continued down to 1659, when it came to an end, partly because there was a growing feeling against the expenditure of any more of the town money upon the church, and partly because it was considered that to carry out the original plan would be to cripple in effect other buildings, and would involve the destruction of part of the Archiginnasio and some fine houses that stood near to the church.

Before entering give some attention to the exterior, as the central doorway especially is worth notice. It is entirely the production of Jacopo della Quercia, the noted sculptor and wood-carver, and was done in 1495. The archway is covered with reliefs which embrace various scenes from the Old and New Testament, over thirty figures of patriarchs and prophets, and representations of the Madonna and Child with San Petronio and San Ambrogio, the patrons of the city. The left and right doorways are the work of other artists, Tribolo and Alfonso Lombardi and their pupils, and are almost equally fine, notably the Resurrection under the left archway, which is a remarkable piece of carving, telling its story with a clearness and force that is worthy of note.

The interior of the church is impressive on account of its vastness and by reason of the great size of the columns, their height, and the subdividing of the arches; and it is rendered still more so by the presence in the aisles of some interesting mediæval crosses that originally stood at the various gates of the city, and have been removed to this church. One of them goes back to the twelfth century, and all of them are curious and quaint. The frescoes in the side chapels are effective but of very little importance, but there are some fine pictures in the church by Costa which are worth looking at, and will repay attention. In the sixth chapel on the right is a St. Jerome, in the seventh on the left a Virgin and Child, dated 1492, and in the fifth on the left an Annunciation. The Virgin and Child is an especially fine picture, and I will refer to it again later on.

The painted glass in the fourth chapel on the right should be noticed. It is by a glass-painter of Ulm, and was made in 1491, as the date on it proves. There is also some good glass in the same chapel in which the Virgin and Child by Costa is to be found; and in the next chapel, which contains the Annunciation, is to be noticed some fifteenth-century intarsia woodwork and a curious pavement of enamelled tiles of about the same date, which is as early as anything of this kind in tile-work is known.

The fine marble screens which are to be found in each of the chief chapels are also notable, and it will be remarked, as a curious feature of the church, that there are two eighteenth-century clocks standing in the aisle on the left as one enters, which give respectively the mean and the solar time. Close to them on the pavement is the meridian line.

Attached to the church is a small museum called the * Museo di San Petronio and containing some important objects. The first room contains only plans and designs for the building by many noted architects, including Palladio, together with a model of the church in wood as it was originally proposed to be built. There is also above the mantelpiece a curious picture of the fifteenth century, attributed to Marco Zoppo, evidently Bolognese, and representing the Virgin and Child with saints; and there are certain quaint astronomical instruments.

INTERIOR OF SAN PETRONIO, BOLOGNA.

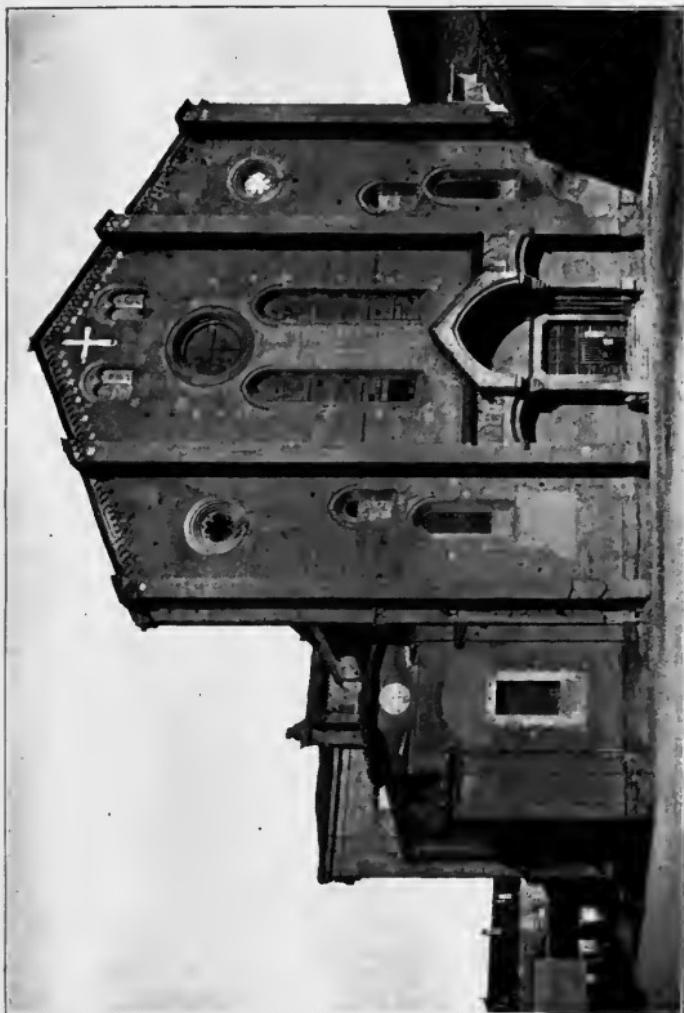

In the inner room is a fine collection of sacred vessels, many of them of great age and interest. Especially noteworthy are the chasses, or reliquaries, of the fourteenth century, composed of ebony and ivory inlaid with precious stone and crystal, and also the curious reliquaries of a century later, which were made from still older ciboria transformed into reliquaries. Some of the chasses, notably 78 and 79, contain fine enamel-work, and many of them are of great beauty. There is also a collection of the ancient vestments of the church, some fine illuminated service-books, a splendid pax and monstrance, and a volume containing an autograph manuscript respecting the book of psalms by St. Anthony of Padua. On the opposite side of the room is to be found part of the unrivalled collection of books of music that belongs to this church, and which extends from the sixteenth century down to recent times.

From San Petronio I want you to go to two other churches which contain thirteenth and fourteenth century work worth attention.

If you are at the Hotel Brun, as is probably the case, you turn to the left on leaving it, and turn down by the side of the hotel, and in a few moments you will be close to the Church of San Francesco. You will not fail to notice, as you approach the church, the three important tombs that stand in the street, one of them nearly hidden by a house, which will recall those two which we saw in front of San Domenico. . These also are erected to important men who were notaries and judges in the thirteenth century, and although they have each of them come under the hand of the restorer and show signs of having been "done up," yet they are interesting examples of the important tombs that the members of this notable college of lawyers were so fond of having erected. They were all three of them built in the middle of the thirteenth century.

The church which stands so close to them has passed through many vicissitudes, and has in turns been a church, a barrack, and a custom-house, and is now again held by its original possessors, the Franciscans, who have restored it. The campanile, which is the original work, is worth notice, and the effect of the interior conveys the impression that was given by the original architects of a great, high, open church; but there is little of the old work that has not been restored out of all character. Part of the reredos is original fourteenth-century work, but it has been added to and altered, and is now not worth study.

The other church which I want you to visit is Santa Maria dei Servi, and is in the Via Mazzini, one of those four streets which branch out near the leaning towers, and is really not far from San Stefano, which is in the next street.

The main feature is not inside the church, but outside, and is the delightful colonnade called the Portico dei Servi, which occupies the square in front of the church.

The church, as its name will tell, is a Servite one, and this colonnade was built by one of the generals of the Order, Fra Manfredi of Forli, who lived in 1390, and who erected this series of graceful arches of marble in order to beautify his church, to provide a place for the people to meet and to listen to sermons, and to give them, as he states, "a place where they can sell their goods and learn the lessons of the life of the Servite saint, San Filippo Benozzi, at the same time." He was a skilful architect, and has done his work with remarkable ability. He is buried in the church for which he worked so hard, at the back of the choir, having died some four years after the completion of this colonnade.

Inside his church you can see if you like, in the tenth chapel to the right, a marble wine-jar, of charming design, which has been in this church since 1370, and was given by the Sultan of Egypt to another general of the Order, one Fra Vitale, as having been used at the marriage at Cana in Galilee. It is preserved in a cupboard near the altar, and is a very fine marble jar undoubtedly of great antiquity.

CHAPTER III.

BOLOGNA UNDER THE BENTIVOGLIO AND THE HOLY SEE

THE fifteenth and sixteenth centuries witnessed the times of the greatest splendour for Bologna, and during that time most of the important churches and palaces were erected.

Notable among them is the great church in the Via Zamboni of San Giacomo Maggiore, which contains the chapel of the Bentivoglio rulers, who were supreme for so long a period in the city.

The chapels in this edifice extend all around the east end behind the high altar, and the Bentivoglio one is the eighteenth from the right and at the extremity of one of the aisles. In it is the important ** altar-piece by Francia, which that artist painted in 1449, and which is one of his most celebrated works. It is usually covered and the chapel locked, but it will readily be exposed to view by the custodian of the place, who is to be found as a rule in the church. Few pictures that are to be seen in these northern towns are more beautiful than is this one, in which the Virgin and Child are surrounded by the patron saints and protectors of the place. The figure of St. Sebastian especially is finely conceived, and the angels that are grouped around the central figure are of great sweetness and beauty. Above the altar-piece is an Ecce Homo by the same artist. Near by in the same chapel is a quaint work by Lorenzo Costa, representing the founder of the family with his wife and children engaged in adoration, and close to it is an alto-rilievo of 1458, representing Annibale Bentivoglio on horseback, by the sculptor who did some of the work on the tomb of St. Dominic, and so obtained his name, Niccolo dell' Arca.

The founder of the family lies buried opposite to the Bentivoglio Chapel in a tomb by Jacopo della Quercia which was originally intended for a Ferrarese doctor, but was adapted by Annibale for a tomb for his father. The effigy is upon an inclined plane. Antonio Bentivoglio was a notable judge, and it was his son Annibale who, ruling as the vicar of the Pope, took to himself a degree of power which made him almost independent of the papacy. Annibale's son was the Giovanni Bentivoglio who ruled in 1450, and who was driven out of the city by the victorious Julius II.

In the chapel there are also to be seen other frescoes by Costa, representing scenes from Petrarch; and triumphs, among which is one that is specially noteworthy, depicting the Triumph of Death.

The custodian who opens the chapel will now take you round at the right through a door, and down some steps into the disused Chapel of Santa Cecilia, also founded by the Bentivogli, and containing the only frescoes that remain in Bologna by Francia, who did so much fresco decoration in the city. The Chapel of Santa Cecilia is covered with the work of Francia, his friend Costa, and their pupils, the two scenes near the altar, depicting the marriage and the death of the saint, being the only ones from the master's own hand. Costa did the two next to those by Francia, and the remainder are by other Bolognese painters, who were their pupils. All of them have suffered much by reason of the damp and the indifference of the custodians for many years, but in 1876 they were carefully repaired, and a method of preservation applied to them which arrested the further progress of the injury. Giovanni Bentivoglio reigned in Bologna for some forty years, and this chapel was one of the many works with which, during that long period, he beautified his native town. It was commenced in 1481, but, for some reason or other, the work was stopped for some time, and the building was not completed till 1504. Then the work of decoration began, was continued during some years, and completed before 1507. The scenes which the master himself painted are represented in the midst of local scenery, and so strong in Francia was the desire to be accurate that the very situation in which the marriage is taking place, with its hills and buildings, can be identified in the present day.

Returning through the passage and chapel to the church, there are yet a few things which it is well to notice. In the fifteenth chapel, in which is preserved for veneration a minute fragment of the True Cross, stands an important, very early altar-piece, divided into many compartments, representing the Coronation of the Virgin, painted by Jacopo Avanzi.

Near to it is an early crucifix, by Simone dei Crocifissi, to whom I have already referred on page 142. The other notable picture is in the eighth chapel (always counting from the right), and is a work by another Bolognese artist, Innocenzo da Imola, to whom we will refer later. It is a really beautiful picture, painted in a Florentine manner, and recalling the work of Raphael, who was his master.

Coming out now into the Via Zamboni, cross the street and pass down the one opposite to the church, the Via Marsala, which will take you to the Church of San Martino Maggiore, in which are certain other notable pictures. Opposite the door in the first chapel on the left is the chief one, a Madonna and Saints, by Francia, which is set in a frame which is also the work of the master, and is a very fine example of those grand frames which are a feature of Bolognese paintings, and which Francia delighted to devise. The whole altar-piece is the work of this master, including the Pietà above, and the Ecce Homo below, and the painting of the arms of the family who were the donors of the work on the frame itself. The picture is thoroughly Ferrarese in its arrangement, being pyramidal and set upon an open arch through which can be seen a charming landscape beyond. The four saints are St. Sebastian, St. Anthony of Padua, St. Bernardino of Siena, and a fourth saint, who is called St. Roch, but is not represented with his usual emblem, and is, I think, erroneously given this name. It is a fine picture, painted in glorious colour, glowing with light, and very dignified in its conception.

Lower down the church on the same side, and close to the high altar, is a work by * Perugino, representing the Assumption, a mannered work, not by any means one of Perugino's satisfactory pictures, but undoubtedly his own painting, as the record exists of his coming to Bologna to oversee its erection in the church where it still remains.

The only other feature in this church which requires notice is the glass in the round window over the altar, which represents St. James, and is from a design by Francia, and delightfully rich in colour and charming in drawing. Two more windows by the master will be found when we go to the Church of the Misericordia.

COSTA.—VIRGIN BETWEEN GOD THE FATHER AND GOD THE SON.

One other church remains to be seen, and that is San Giovanni-in-Monte, which is near San Stefano, standing back in a very short street up an ascent from the Via San Stefano. It is desirable to see this church, as it contains two works by Costa which are very beautiful, and which are also characteristic of the Ferrarese treatment of landscape, with its rolling distant view of hills and valleys carrying the eye on from distance to distance, as in Umbrian pictures. In the seventh chapel on the right is a Virgin enthroned with saints, and in the choir a lovely Virgin between God the Father and God the Son in the sky, with six adoring saints below, set in a very charming landscape. These pictures were both painted in the same year, 1497, and are particularly characteristic paintings by this master.

There are other churches in Bologna in which treasures will be found, — hardly one without something well worth seeing and many of them quite rich in paintings, — but these are the chief ones. The others you may visit if you are staying some time in the place and desire to obtain a very clear view of Bolognese painters and their works. They are not so important as the ones that I have named, and therefore I omit them.

The palaces of Bologna are often extremely fine in their architecture, and will be noticed as you go along the streets. A very important one is the Palazzo Bevilacqua, where the famous Council of Trent held two of its meetings when driven away from Trento by fever. It is said to have been designed by Bramantino, and stands close to the central piazza. The ironwork of its gallery, over the entrance and also inside the quadrangle, is of considerable beauty.

One of the quaintest houses in Bologna is the Palazzo Isolani, in the Via Mazzini, with its strange overhanging front of woodwork supported by huge wood beams.

All over the city will be found important palaces that are worth notice; they are a feature of the place, revealing the wealth and importance to which, in its Bentivoglio days, the city attained.

Another feature of the city is to be found in the arcades, which extend in all directions, and enable the visitor to pass under cover from one point to another over almost the entire place.

Perhaps ere we leave the sights of the place, it will be well to return for a short time to the Museo Civico, which we visited at the beginning of our sojourn.

It is interesting to notice in Room XIV. the collection of ancient musical instruments, which is as important as any in Europe and contains very many instruments of great rarity. Bologna has always been a great place for music, and it now possesses one of the finest libraries of old music in Europe, and many of the instruments preserved in the case on the wall opposite to the door by which you enter the room are local and historical. The viols and viorbas, trombas and arclutes, should be noticed, as it is very seldom that these quaint things which appear so often in Italian pictures can be seen. Some of the Hebrew tombs in Rooms XV. and XVI. are worth attention, notably the one of 1562, in which Pietro Canonici is lecturing seven persons, and four others are to be seen peeping over the wall. The Zambeccari tomb in Room XVI. commemorates a man who was an important member of that family who patronized Francia in so satisfactory a manner.

Then lastly, in Room XVII., notice the unrivalled series of ancient guild books which are open in the cases, and which commence in 1286 and continue down to the sixteenth century, providing a marvellously complete history of the guild life of the place, full of the deepest interest to historians, and only waiting for some great scholar to devote his whole life to their investigation, and open up a narrative that is likely to be of considerable importance. Many of the illuminations in these books are admirable and quaint in their naïve simplicity.

CHAPTER IV.

THE ART OF BOLOGNA — THE GALLERY

THE art of Bologna is an imported one, having come from Ferrara, and originated with Francesco Cossa, who removed from that city to Bologna in 1470, and settled in the latter place.

There were, of course, painters in Bologna before that time, such as Simone dei Crocifissi, who has been mentioned, Marco Zoppo, and the school of miniature painters who are represented by Franco Bolognese, who lived in the early fourteenth century.

However, until Cossa left Ferrara, there seems to have been no regular school of artists in the place. An even greater and more important link between the schools of Ferrara and Bologna is to be found in Lorenzo Costa, who came to Bologna in 1483, finding Cossa already there and in the full swing of work.

Costa formed a close friendship with Francesca Francia, the goldsmith, and they decided to live together, occupying different floors of the same house; from these two men, who were certainly not so much in the position of master and pupil as in that of friends helping one another, came the greatest works of the school.

Francia was already well known as a clever goldsmith ere Costa came to the place, and he was also a typefounder and an engraver, but he speedily became more notable as an artist than he had been in either of the other crafts, although he always signed his pictures as Aurifaber, or goldsmith.

He worked largely for the Bentivoglio family, and many of his best works still remain in the city. When his patrons were driven out from Bologna, he stayed behind and continued to work for Pope Julius II., who was glad to employ so clever a craftsman.

Francia was well advanced in years when he first took to painting, and it is possible that he might never have developed his powers had not Costa come to Bologna; but he was too old a man to become a pupil of the Ferrarese master, and there is as much evidence of Costa taking from Francia as of Francia absorbing from Costa, when the works of the two artists are examined. In several cases they worked side by side at the same altar-piece, each doing his own part of it; and these separate panels, when compared, bear eloquent testimony to the genius and close friendship of the two rivals.

Francia's work is noted for its full, rich colouring, its sweetness, its deep and intense pathos, and its truth and accuracy. He delighted in ornament and in jewelry, and painted it with loving care and attention, and he also loved to represent actual objects, such as vestments, crosses, and personal ornaments, and to paint them with such accuracy that they can even now be identified.

He has affinities with the Umbrians, and especially with Perugino; and as I have shown in my book on this artist, there is every probability that he met Perugino in Bologna at the very time when this Umbrian influence can be the more clearly traced, as the great Umbrian master spent some days in the city, in order to superintend the hanging of certain of his pictures. In all probability the two men met, and had intimate conversation as to the art which they both practised with such skill.

Timoteo Viti was a pupil of Francia, and left him in 1495, returning to Urbino, where he is supposed by many eminent critics to have had a great influence upon the youthful Raphael. His works are rare, and are reminiscent of the manner of Francia his master.

Other Bolognese masters who deserve notice are Innocenzo da Imola, another pupil of Francia, and afterwards in the school of Raphael, with whom, it is known, Francia was on terms of closest friendship; also Tibaldi, who left Francia for Michelangelo; Primaticcio, who went to Giulio Romano; Abate, and others.

Francia had, it is said, as many as two hundred pupils, and his influence therefore spread far and near.

. Quite a new school arose in Bologna some fifty years after Francia had died, started by Ludovico Caracci, who, with his relatives, Agostino and Annibale, settled in the place in 1589. He was by no means a great artist, but he seems to have possessed the power of teaching to an important degree, and his pupils became famous. The motto which he adopted as the title for his academy was, "Those who regret the past, despise the present, and aspire to a better future." The days were past, however, for anything like a great inspiration; it was the period of huge canvases and frescoes, dense shadows, large powerful figures, heavy draperies, sombre effect in colour, and a greater attention to the effect of the picture as a whole than to the beauty of the individual faces or forms. The simplicity of the older masters had gone, their fervour and devotion had given place to quite other ideas, and pathos too often degenerated into sentimentality, and fervour into exaggerated contortion.

The three Caracci were very different one from the other. Ludovico was slow, heavy, determined, with very little inspiration, but plenty of knowledge and great ability to teach others what he could not perform himself.

Agostino was a very skilful engraver, a correct draughtsman, and a poetical man, who was learned in the stories and legends of the classics. His engravings are more important than his paintings, although his masterpiece, which is in Bologna, and which we shall see presently, is a grand and dignified work.

Annibale was more truly a genius than the other two, but he was of a restless and turbulent character.

His works possess more true pathos than do the other paintings of the school, and are not only powerful but sometimes even inspired and inspiring. He was great as a painter of landscape, and devoted much time and attention to the landscape backgrounds that were so important in his paintings.

The Caracci had a pupil who was a profounder genius than his masters, Guido Reni, and who, if he had only contented himself with a few works and those of real inspiration, would have been a really notable master. He stands out with Domenichino and Albani amongst the host of men who worked in the Caracci school as representative of distinct genius, but is head and shoulders above his two companions. At one time his pictures were greatly in demand, and he was one of the most popular of old masters. Now he is suffering from an equally unmerited amount of opprobrium.

His works are so numerous as to prove that he had a large number of clever pupils to whom he allotted the minor portions of his gigantic compositions, but he himself was capable of flights of genius that were all the more impressive by reason of the ordinary level of his regular work. He was fond of huge imaginative scenes, dull neutral tints, black dense shadows, and idealized abstractions that were neither human nor divine.

Guido was a man of tremendous energy, extreme cleverness, and considerable executive genius, but his productiveness was far in advance of his abilities, and his pictures are at times both in ideas and colouring distinctly unpleasant.

Domenichino was a sentimentalist, Albani a copyist of other painters' ideas, and with them the school passed away, and Bolognese art was no more.

It has been necessary to refer at some length to these Mannerists or Eclectics, who formed the Decadence of Italian art, because they originated in Bologna, worked in that city, are connected with it, and their works are so well represented in its gallery that no sketch, however brief, of the art of Bologna is complete without them.

Taken as a whole they are extravagant and theatrical. Their origin was due to the great demand for pictures, the haste with which they were painted, the small sums that were paid for them, and the desire on the part of those who commissioned the paintings to cover very large wall spaces with effective bold decoration.

Certain characteristics belong to them all. The technique, in the case especially of the Caracci and their immediate followers, is accurate and satisfactory. In drawing and in colour they are often very near to perfection, but there is no originality, no breathing spirit of inspiration, to be found. Nature is not studied save in the landscapes in the paintings of Annibale, and there is a feeling of sham and imitation in trees, in rocks, hills, and valleys. The figures sprawl over the canvas, and are not clothed in silk or in satin, but merely in drapery, which is monotonous, vulgar, and commonplace. There is no delight in painting jewels, ornaments, armour, or weapons with accuracy and feeling; they are merely represented or suggested, but not painted in the true way in which the old masters painted them.

The pictures are full of terror, horror, and cruelty; they aim to excite and impress; or else they abound in such exaggerated sweetness as becomes cloying and unpleasant, and is suited to attract a vitiated taste and a voluptuous sentimentality.

Here and there stand out pictures which are mannered to a less degree, and are to a certain extent truthful; but on the whole the school is marked by degeneration, which was, in the hands of Carlo Dolci and Sassoferato, to attain to the lowest depths of false sentiment and unnatural feeling.

Having thus glanced at the main features of Bolognese art, let me take you to the gallery in which you will find every side of it represented, in rooms particularly well lighted, arranged, and catalogued, and specially convenient for study.

The tramway down the Via Zamboni passes the door of the gallery, and this tram can be reached by another one which passes the door of the Hotel Brun, so that if you desire, as the gallery is at the other end of the town, you can ride to it all the way. After passing up-stairs and through the turnstile, it will be well for you to walk on through the first few galleries till you reach the chief room, which is lettered E, and in that room begin your studies.

In Room E is an unrivalled collection of the works of Francia, which are the chief gems of the gallery, but perhaps it will be well for you to go to the left wall first, and see the paintings by Cossa and Costa.

64 is by Cossa, signed in full, and was painted by him in Bologna for the Commercial Guild of the day to adorn their chapel. It is harder than the work of Costa, more formal, dull in colouring, not free from forced and awkward contorted attitude, and somewhat rigid in its expression. The kneeling donor, Alberto de' Catanei, is a notable figure, and the head of the patron saint of Bologna, San Petronio, is worth particular notice. The whole conception is severe, quiet, strong, and simple. The effect is that of dignity and restraint. The slight knowledge of decorative effect and of anatomy is compensated for by the admirable grouping and the stern truth of the picture. It is very Ferrarese, and forms a starting-point in our survey.

Of the work of Costa (65, 392, and 376) we do not find such satisfactory examples as those we have already seen in the churches, notably those in San Giovanni-in-Monte. San Petronio (65) is a dignified figure, bearing in his hand the city of Bologna, and having with him St. Francis and St. Dominic. 376 is a Marriage of the Virgin, and 392 a Virgin and Child seated. All three are signed works, the last named being the earliest, 1491, San Petronio 1502, and the Sposalizio 1505. Costa is weak in colour compared with his friend, there is a timidity about his drawing and a weakness about his faces, while the draperies are often poor in colour, cold and grayish in tone; but he is, notwithstanding all this, a really great master, a very accomplished painter, who loses something of his attractiveness when brought into such close contact with Francia, but who is always inspiring, enlightening, and sumptuous, with a great love for beauty, a quiet religious dignity, and a charm which can easily be felt.

Now turn to the opposite wall and look at the works of his friend. The earliest work in this gallery by Francia is not a painting at all, but is in niello. Item 586 is a frame containing two works in metal, each intended as a pax, and worked by Francia in what is called niello. The little one is adorned with the arms of the Sforza and Bentivoglio families, and was probably intended as a wedding-gift from Giovanni Bentivoglio to his bride, Ginevra Sforza. It represents the Crucifixion, and is set within an arch bearing an inscription, and having above it a representation of Christ spreading out His wounded hands, with an angel on either side of Him.

The other pax is a later one, and depicts the resurrection. It has on it the arms of the Felicini family and Ringhieri family, and was, like the first named, probably intended for a wedding-gift.

These two panels of silver were prepared in the following way. The design was cut with a sharp tool on the metal. A solution of borax, to act as a flux, was brushed over the metal plate and thoroughly worked into the incised lines. A prepared powdered amalgam of silver, copper, lead, and sulphur was then shaken on to the plate so as to cover it completely. The plate was then heated over a charcoal fire, more amalgam being added as the powder fused upon any defective places. When the powder had become thoroughly liquid so as to fill up all the lines, the plate was allowed to cool. After that the plate was scraped down so as to remove all the superfluous amalgam, leaving only what had filled up the incised lines; and then, lastly, the whole plate was carefully and finely polished till it presented the appearance of a smooth metal surface with a design upon it in gray-black lines.

The method was a very favourite one, and was used for decoration of vessels of all kinds, especially those that were used at the altar, and was sometimes still further enriched, as in the case before us, by the addition of coloured enamel. In process of time, it led to the discovery of the method of engraving, and the earliest prints that were made were niello proofs used by the niellist as tests of the progress of his work.

It was in this way that Francia began his success as a niellist first, and then afterwards as a painter, but he always retained the ideas of a niellist and a goldsmith, and we shall be able to trace this habit of thought and action in his pictures. His earliest painting in this room is probably the Crucifixion that is near to the works of Cossa and Costa on the wall close to the door. It is 373, and it will at once be noticed that the draperies are stiff and formal as if made of metal, that the hands are hard, and that the amount of fine detail in the picture bespeaks the goldsmith rather than the artist.

The picture which Vasari calls the first that Francia painted is 78 and is dated 1494, but it is quite inconceivable that it was the initial work of the artist, as he must have painted many works ere he could have acquired the dexterity and skill that enabled him to paint this very lovely one.

It was done for Francesco Felicini, and introduced into it can be seen the jewel that Francia did for the same church, that of the Misericordia, for which this altar-piece was painted, and which he was requested to introduce in the painting. It is a Madonna and Child with Saints Augustine, Monica, John the Baptist, Francis, Proculus, and Sebastian. Mark the love of detail that is so clear in this picture, not only in the jewel, but in the cope worn by St. Augustine, the clasps of the book, the chain worn by the donor, the staff carried by the bishop, and the decoration on the steps of the throne. Such details will always be found in the pictures of Francia, painted with infinite care and attention and yet never allowed to detract from the right understanding of the picture, but treated as accessories with just the discretion that they needed.

The picture which hangs so close to it was done soon after this one, and was the result of the great satisfaction given by Francia to the Bentivoglio, by the altar-piece painted for the Church of San Giacomo which we have seen earlier. This one was done for the son of the ruler, one Antonio, who was archdeacon of the city, and was part of an altar-piece commissioned from the two painters, Costa and his friend, for the Church of the Misericordia.

The lunette by Costa is still in the church, but so high up and in so bad a light as to be almost invisible, and the predella we have already seen in Milan. With a view I suppose to subordinating his colour scheme to Costa's cooler and quieter scheme, Francia has substituted for his customary rich colouring a colder tone, and this has been intensified by the "rifacimento" to which this work has been treated. The persons who are introduced into this picture are not only Antonio the donor, who is kneeling in adoration and who is depicted, as he has but so lately returned from the Holy Land, in the garb of a pilgrim; but opposite to him Girolamo Pandolfi di Casio,—his great friend, who had been on pilgrimage with him, and who was a poet and had received the laurel wreath,—and also St. Joseph and St. Augustine, and a person who is called St. Francis.

We cannot examine each of the pictures in this room in full detail, or we shall not have any space for the consideration of other rooms, but Francia is so much the greatest artist represented in the gallery, that it is well to devote special attention to him, even if others suffer thereby. Number 80 is a very lovely picture representing the Madonna and Child with four saints, and here the effect of colour is remarkable. It is mainly green in its varying shades, and green can be found all over the picture, each shade harmonized in a wonderful manner. This work is called the Manzuoli altar-piece, having been commissioned by a lady of that name; the angel in it is of peculiar beauty.

The strange crumpled effect of the draperies upon the ground near the feet of each figure is due to the influence of Costa and is Ferrarese, but as Francia developed he left this odd mannerism behind him, and we do not find it in his later works.

The Scappi altar-piece (372), painted for Giovanni Scappus, belongs to about the same period, and represents St. Francis and St. Paul with the Madonna and Child.

Of the Annunciation there are two paintings in this gallery, 79 and 371, the latter being the earlier one of the two. It is dated 1500, and although a little crowded in arrangement is a very lovely picture. The four saints are grand figures, St. John, St. Francis, St. Bernardino, and a warrior saint, either St. George or San Proculo-Soldato. It was painted for a Franciscan church, and therefore has the arms of the Order upon it. Notice also the painting of the birds and plants which are always in Francia's pictures depicted with such accuracy and such care.

The other Annunciation is a later one, simpler in character, although not so late, and therefore not so simple as the one that we saw in Milan. Here there are only two saints, one on each side of the Madonna, and the quiet, calm expression of the face of the Virgin is very delightful and attractive. This work (79) is a very grand piece of colour, red in all its tones, and exemplifies one more of Francia's characteristics, the love he has of making one colour tone all the effect of the picture and give the key to its colour scheme.

We have seen how green tones the Manzuoli picture, and appears even in the shot colour of the vestments in the mantle, the lining of the vestment, the armory, the hills, the columns, the dragon, and the throne. We may notice a blue effect in the Bentivoglio Adoration of the Child, a brown in 372, a reddish gray in 78, and here we find red taking the same chief place.

There are other works by Francia in the room which require attention. We may look at the early Pietà (83), full of tender pathos; at the delightful Madonna and Child (499), with most characteristic beauty in the face of the Virgin, and gay, bright, irresponsible childhood expressed in the Divine Infant; and we may look at the quaint votive predella (82), small and full of strange mystical teaching, and painted for the Church of the Misericordia by a donor to commemorate the event to which I have given some attention in my book on this artist.

Having now seen all the chief works by the great artist in the room, it will be well to look at those painted by his son and successor which are above them in the higher tier numbered 84, 85, 86, 87, and 588. In them will be seen the same idea of glorious colour that characterized the father, but it is harder and cruder in tone, and Giacomo has not the ability to melt one hue into another that his father possessed in so preëminent a degree. There is far less originality, much more stiffness, and a lacking in inspiration that is very marked; and after a careful examination of the father's works, you will not care to devote much attention to the son.

We will now leave this room, but if you are sufficiently interested in Francia to carry your investigation further, I can recommend you to visit the Church of the Misericordia which is outside the walls of the city, just beyond the Porta Castiglione, and which was in Francia's time the most popular church in Bologna, and the one for which many of his greatest works were painted. In it you will find the part of the altar-piece done by the two friends which Costa painted, a curious fresco by Francia, and above all some lovely stained glass in two circular windows that were designed and coloured by the artist. Then in the Archiginasio, in the inner library, you will be shown the earliest work of Francia that remains in Bologna, a Crucifixion, which is very full of the goldsmith characteristic, and is curiously hard and angular in its draperies and limbs. It is redolent of the niellist to a greater extent than any other work.

In the Church of San Vitale ed Agricola in the Via San Vitale you will find a very archaic sacred picture to which Francia has painted some angels playing on musical instruments, placing his canvas over the original picture, which can be seen through a large oval in it, and adding his delightful angels at the desire of the people who worshipped at the church, in order to give additional honour to their favourite Madonna.

Another interesting work of the same artist can be found in the Palazzo Comunale, in the building over the entrance of which can be seen the figure of the Pope, which I told you was transformed into that of the San Petronio. It is up-stairs on the first floor, and is a fresco painted on a wall to commemorate the safety of the city during a terrible earthquake of 1505. It is undoubtedly a genuine work of the master's own hand, and has an interesting inscription underneath it.

Lastly, you may care to see a work of Francia's early days, a Madonna and Child which is in the third chapel on the right in the Church of San Dominico, and which has ornamental crowns of metal-work attached to its canvas, quite spoiling the picture, which is very difficult, if not impossible, to see adequately, unless you can get the glass door which covers it opened. Its position is over a very important altar at which several miracles are said to have been wrought, and by reason of which this extra adornment was given to the picture.

All these pictures, and the quaint shield made by Francia, with some delightful niello-work around its border, preserved in the house of the Rodriguez family and not often to be seen, will be found fully described in my work on Francia, but are noted here in case that you may care, when in Bologna, to make a fuller study of this artist and his works than the space of this book will allow me to set forth.

We will now leave the Francia room and return to the next room, called D.

The chief picture in this room is the celebrated work of Raphael (152) representing St. Cecilia, which is considered the chief ornament of the gallery. The guides with persistent importunity will seem to begrudge every minute that you give to other works, unless you give what in their ideas is a proper attention to this picture, which they seem to think is worth in merit all the others put together. It has unfortunately been so terribly restored that whatever beauty it once possessed is very much a matter of the past. The sky has been scandalously repainted in the roughest manner, and all the delightful cherubs which filled the heaven, as they do now in the Madonna di San Sisto, at Dresden, and which can yet be seen in the sketches for this Santa Cecilia, have long ago disappeared, and therefore one of the greatest beauties of the composition has gone. The face of the Magdalen who stands by the side of St. Cecilia is still one of great loveliness, but the process of transferring the picture from panel to canvas and the repainting of many of the faces has ruined the rest of the work. The picture was painted for Elena dal' Oggio, a relation of Cardinal Pucci, in 1513, and finished in 1515, and was intended for a chapel of St. Cecilia in San Giovanni-in-Monte, where now, in the transept close to the grave of the donor, a copy of the picture hangs. The faces must all have been very lovely, as traces of great beauty can still be perceived in them, but at no time can the work have been one of Raphael's greatest successes, by reason of serious errors in its composition. Deserting the accepted method adopted by artists of his period, notably by those of the Florentine and Bolognese school, of painting inanimate objects from the object itself, and with accurate detail, Raphael in this picture gave a free rein to his imagination, and so spoiled the very feature of his picture which he desired should be important, and which, in the hands of such a man as Francia, would have been delightful.

Not one of the musical instruments is correct. The viol has its strings broken and yet the bridge stands upright, although nothing is holding it, and the tail is still strained out in the proper direction; the pipes of the organ are falling out of the frame as no pipes could possibly fall were the portable organ held in the position in which the saint holds it, and with the connecting string broken; the wooden pipes are broken across at just their strongest parts, where by no possibility could they have broken; and even the viol is itself broken where it is not in the least likely that it would have sprung, and in a manner into which the wood could not possibly go.

The design is Raphael's, the composition is delightful, and one of the faces is fine, but more than that I cannot with any honesty say; and as regards real art, there are many pictures in the room that we have just left that are far finer and far more instructive than is Raphael's St. Cecilia in its present condition.

Opposite to it hangs a lovely * Perugino painted for the same church of San Giovanni-in-Monte, representing the Virgin in glory with four adoring saints, St. Michael, St. Catherine, St. John the Divine, and St. Apollonia. The St. Michael is the same figure that appears in the Certosa altar-piece in the National Gallery, but perhaps finer in figure and more refined in beauty (mark especially the hands) than in that celebrated work, while the other three figures are stately and impressive in their calm, isolated composure. The picture was painted in 1498, and in the following year I have ascertained that Perugino visited Bologna to see to the hanging of the picture, and there no doubt met with Francia, who was at that time in the full pursuit of his art.

To that meeting I attribute much of the Perugino influence that appears in the works of Francia, or else to an earlier visit which the great Umbrian paid to Bologna.

Other noteworthy pictures in this room are 61, a very fine Cima of the Virgin and Child, a lovely Bellinesque picture in its original frame and signed by the artist in full; some interesting works by Imola, notably 216, a dreary picture, but of pleasing colour; 292, a very Raphaelesque picture, too rosy in colour; and 89, a very effective work; 210 is by Giulio Romano; 198 is by Vasari, author of the "Lives of the Painters;" and 145 is by Tintoretto.

There is nothing in Room C which need detain you for a moment, as all the pictures that it contains are by the various lesser men whom Bologna produced in such numbers.

Room B represents the Caracci and their school.

By Ludovico the founder there are—42, Madonna and Child; 43, Transfiguration; 47, Conversion of St. Paul; 48, Madonna in Glory and others; but all of them are marked by extravagance, contortion, dense shadows, and dreadful faces. Mark especially the Madonna in 42.

By Agostino there are—34 and 35, hot, dreamy, and theatrical, although good in tone on the whole, and accurate in drawing.

By the greatest man of the three, Annibale, there are many works. 36 and 37 are examples of mere beauty, some lovely faces, a delightful truth and accuracy in drawing, fair colouring, but an entire absence of spirituality or inspiration.

Still later men are represented in 206, 207, and 208, which are by Domenichino, very theatrical, mystic pictures, emotional, powerful, strong, but lacking in any gentle spirit, or in true devotion. They are exciting pictures, full of horror, especially 208, which appeals only to the lower emotions of pain and terror; and yet there is a grandeur about them, and ability and skill are marked in the technique, handling, and grouping. Mark in 207 the presence in the hand of each person of a rosary, and the mystic character that the artist has given to the composition.

The other important pictures in this room are still less satisfactory from an artistic point of view, and belong to a still later man, Guercino. The pathos in them is artificial and ignoble, the colouring and lighting unearthly and exaggerated, the shadows absurdly dense, and the composition theatrical.

The first room, A, is given up practically to Guido, by whom all the chief works in it were painted. The finest one is undoubtedly the rough sketch for the * Ecce Homo (142), which is far finer than the finished picture, bolder, more truthful, less emotional, and less forced in pathos.

The chief work in the room is the vast Madonna della Pietà (134), which represents the Virgin and Child, and the chief saints connected with Bologna; and beneath them, as in Francia's fresco of the Madonna Terremoto in the Palazzo Comunale, a view of the city with its walls and towers. There is no doubt that at times Guido proved himself to be really great. In style and colouring he was at times delightful, but he never could keep up to the high level throughout a picture, and in this one there are parts which are merely silly sentiment. The picture is, however, interesting and imposing.

In 135, the Slaughter of the Innocents, it is horror that is depicted, and not grief. There is no pathos in Guido, unless it appears in the Ecce Homo sketch; all the rest is theatrical.

The banner picture (138) must not be overlooked. It was painted to be used as a processional banner, and is certainly a good composition, and better in colouring than others; but it was too quickly painted for the artist to be able to put much conscientious work into it, and there is very little feeling to be discovered in it.

In this room there is, however, one really fine picture of quite a different school (360), in the centre of the room, the work of Niccolo da Foligno, called Alunno. Here is the work of a man of another age, deficient, if you like, in the knowledge that these later men possessed, but full of devotion and reverence, having plenty of time and plenty of desire to paint a picture that should tell the story that existed deep down in his own mind, and which he felt he must translate into colour to the best of his ability, and then offer as an expression of devotion to her in whose honour it was painted. It was done in 1482, a very early date compared with what we have been examining. It is strange, weird, and perhaps hard, but there is an inspiration in it which all these vast canvases of the later time wholly lack.

Now return through the whole suite of rooms to the Francia room again, and leave it by the other door, turning into the corridor for a few minutes.

Here are the Primitives again. We shall not find accurate drawing; we shall notice strange colour and technique, and a gradual striving after better things; but we are back from the times of theatrical trickery to the times of devotion.

205 is an important early Venetian work by the Vivarini, 1450.

102 is by Giotto, simple, direct, telling its story well; just the faces and no more; quite a delightful work.

202 is said to have been painted by that local saint of high repute, St. Catherine Vigri, and represents St. Ursula. It is a picture of 1450.

Then there are numerous works by Avanzi, by early Bolognese men, by Lippo Dalmasio, Simone da Bologna, and by unknown artists; but this little gallery will repay some careful attention, and will quiet you after the overwhelming effect of the later pictures, and enable you once again to collect your ideas and gather up your scattered thoughts into focus.

Only the first part of this gallery (entering, that is, from the Francia room) will need attention; all the rest can be passed by entirely.

CHAPTER V.

EXCURSIONS

If there is sufficient time it is well for you to try and see the old Olivetan church, called San Michele in Bosco, that stands about two miles from the Porta d'Azeglio. To do so you have to write to the director for an order, and at your hotel you will be informed to whom to address your letter. The order is sent to you the next day at your hotel, and the church can be seen on certain days only. It is superb, situated on the top of a very high hill, and it can be easily reached by going most of the way by tram, and walking the remainder of the distance.

On arriving, one word of caution is needful. The whole convent is now occupied as an orthopædic hospital, and the order admits you first to this hospital, of which the authorities are very proud; and unless you are very determined and firm in your decision to see only the church and the frescoes you will first of all be taken through the hospital, and worried by the sight of horrid instruments, operating-rooms, wards, nurses, and poor cripples with all sorts of terrible complaints.

The system is to take the visitor through all this distressing sight in order to obtain for the custodian a fee before you are allowed to enter the deserted church, which the authorities consider of far less importance than their hospital, with all its instruments of torture. If you are quite firm in your refusal, however, to cross the steps of the hospital, you will be taken into the church through a lovely doorway, the work of the celebrated Peruzzi, passing two exquisite holy-water basins, and will see some fine intarsia work in the stalls. The cloister contains some interesting ruined frescoes by the Caracci much more important than their paintings, and in the refectory you will find a very attractive series of views of all the houses of the Order, forming a charming decoration. There is not very much in all to be seen, but the excursion is worth taking, as the exterior of the church is good, its position delightful, and the frescoes in the cloister and those in the choir by Innocenzo da Imola are important in the history of Bolognese art.

Another excursion that can be made is to the Certosa, which is now used as a Campo Santo. This also can be reached by tram, with a short walk from the point where the tram stops. The actual cemetery is not interesting, but the Carthusian church has some excellent stalls in it, some good fresco-work by Ludovico Carracci, and is an interesting piece of fourteenth-century architecture. Close to it will be seen the beginning of the interminable colonnade, which leads, after nearly three miles of walking under cover, up to the sanctuary of the Madonna di San Luca, the most sacred place in the neighbourhood. The church contains the miraculous picture said to have been painted by St. Luke, and regarded with much veneration; but besides that there is only an early work of Guido to be seen, and the view to the visitor, which is of great beauty, is the chief attraction.

There are many delightful drives about the outskirts of Bologna, and some interesting villas that can be visited if time and inclination permit.

Part IV. Ravenna

CHAPTER I.

HISTORY OF RAVENNA

R AVENNA is like no other town in Italy. It stands quite apart from all others and is entirely distinctive. It can be compared with no other place, and the page of history which it illumines is lighted up by no other place in the world. To properly understand it, Ravenna is the only guide, and since the time of the city's great prosperity, it has practically stood still; has crystallized with all its relics about it; and now reveals them to the visitor who steps back in Ravenna to the very early centuries, from the fourth to the eighth, and finds that the whole history of the place is in those early times.

In Roman times it was not so much one town, as a collection of three, which were so closely intertwined as to be one in completeness. There was Ravenna proper; there was the port of Classis founded by Augustus, and then there was the long line of houses called Cæsarea, which connected Classis with Ravenna. Of this last, nothing but a church and a few cottages remain; of Classis, only the great basilica of Sant' Apollinare in Classis and a few cottages close by; and only Ravenna itself, much shrunken from what it was, now stands to tell us of the past glories of the place.

The chief history of Ravenna, however, commences with the time of Honorius, the son of Theodosius; who reigned from 395 to 423 over the Western Empire, his brother, Arcadius taking the Eastern.

Honorius, whose reign was one long warfare with the Goths and other barbarian people who were at this time increasing in their power and desire to obtain the country, and who attacked Rome over and over again, removed his court from the Eternal City to Ravenna and made that his capital. Sheltered behind its malarious plains and its watery flats, he lived in a greater security than he had done in Rome. Here was the seat of the Roman power during, not only his reign, but that of his son Valentinian III., Majorian, and others (emperors only in name) who succeeded him.

In 475, after the death of the last of these nine puppet emperors, Romulus Augustulus, there was a barbarian ruler in the person of Odoacer, and he held his court at Ravenna, as by that time Rome had been sacked by the Vandals, and the last important link that bound together the two empires had been broken.

Then a new power came into play, that of the Ostrogoths, and Ravenna was besieged by Theodoric, the King of the Ostrogoths, who had invaded Italy. For three years he attacked Ravenna, and at last, by a blockade, forced Odoacer to surrender the city, and slew him.

Theodoric reigned in Ravenna for thirty-three years, and to him many of the greatest buildings in the place owe their existence. Here he was buried, and here his tomb (despoiled of its contents) still remains a monument to the devotion of his daughter Amalasuntha, who was murdered a few years after her father's death.

The death of Theodoric, who was a strong ruler, was followed by the accession of successors who were weak and unable to hold together the united Gothic kingdom which Theodoric had by his own prowess and skill brought into existence.

A powerful monarch was now on the throne of the Eastern Empire, reigning at Constantinople in the person of Justinian, and he desired once again to unite Italy to his dominions. His great general, Belisarius, went forward with a large army, and in 536 regained Rome. The Goths made a strong attempt to retake it, but were beaten off, and retreated to the powerful stronghold of Ravenna, whither Belisarius promptly followed them. Here he found there was disaffection, and a strong sense of dissatisfaction with the Gothic king, Vitigis, who had allowed himself to be overcome. Belisarius attacked Ravenna, and by the help of those who were disaffected was enabled to enter the place and take it. The Goths thought that he would, with the capture of Ravenna, himself assume the chief power in Italy, but he was true to the emperor who had sent him, and once again was Ravenna united with the Roman Empire. Amalasuntha had, soon after the death of Theodoric, placed herself and her kingdom under the protection of Byzantium, but now the union was completed.

Then for a couple of hundred years Ravenna remained united to, or dependent upon, the empire, which ruled from Constantinople, and was governed by a series of exarchs, commencing with Narses, who was the successor of Belisarius.

In 728 a fresh ruler came upon the scene, as the city was taken by the Lombard king, Luitprand, whose name we have seen on the font in the Atrio di Pilato in San Stefano in Bologna.

He captured first the city of Classis, which was still the port of the city, and then marched against Ravenna and took it. His successor, Aistulf, reigned in Ravenna, and then he in his turn was driven out by the Franks under Pepin, and then the city was given over by his successor, Charlemagne, to the Holy See, and became the initial portion of the Patrimony of St. Peter.

Charlemagne visited Ravenna, carried off from it a brazen statue of Theodoric and the marble columns of his palace, and decided to build the new cathedral which he was erecting at Aix la Chapelle on the model of San Vitale in Ravenna.

From his time, with certain intervals, during the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries, Ravenna remained attached to the Holy See. In the thirteenth century a certain Pietro assumed the dignity of Duke of Ravenna, and his son followed him in the titular dukedom. Then the Emperor Frederick II. came against Ravenna, and, driving out the dukes, held it for a time; but in his turn he was driven back by the forces of the Pope, and Innocent IV. attached the place once more to his possessions. In 1275 another change of a temporary character took place, as an important local family, the Polentani, came to eminence and position, and ruled Ravenna, nominally in the name of the Pope, ostensibly as a republic, but actually as a kingdom of their own. Their rule did not last for a great while, and then the citizens, finding that the papacy had other matters in hand that were occupying attention, placed themselves under the protection of Venice in 1441, and were well and wisely ruled by the great republic for some sixty years. Again in 1509 Ravenna was given back to the warrior Pope, Julius II., by the republic of Venice, which was unable to hold it any longer, and once again Ravenna had its old rulers.

But three years after this event the neighbourhood was the scene of a great battle when Louis XII. with his forces, under the command of Gaston de Foix, attacked Ravenna, and in 1513 was fought the battle of Ravenna, at which Gaston de Foix was killed, and which gave the victory to the French, although their terrible losses at the hands of the papal and Spanish forces did not permit them to follow up the victory.

This was practically the last event of importance that was a part of the history of Ravenna, and from that time down to our own it remained an important city, sometimes the chief and at other times the second in importance in the state of Romagna. It has thus had a very eventful and moving history. Its strong position at the mouth of its river, surrounded by vast watery plains, with the sea up to its very doors, which, gradually leaving it, converted its shallow part into a morass and then into an unhealthy flat land, has been its strength; while the difficulty of approaching it, and its out-of-the-way position, have enabled it to retain and preserve the monuments in which it is so rich, and which relate so exclusively to its very early history.

It is Gothic, Ostrogothic, and Byzantine history that we can learn in Ravenna, as of its later history little remains; but in Gothic and Byzantine monuments, no other town is so rich and no other place can so perfectly set forth the art and craft of that period.

CHAPTER II.

CHURCHES AND MOSAICS

THE oldest buildings in Ravenna are the baptistery, that stands close to the cathedral and is also called San Giovanni-in-Monte; the chapel of the archbishop, which is in the rear of the cathedral, and the cathedral itself.

They all stand within five minutes' walk of the Hotel Byron, to which all visitors go, and we will commence our inspection with the ** baptistery, which is, in its way, one of the most lovely as well as one of the most interesting buildings which the city has to show.

It is said to have been founded by the good archbishop of the see, Neon, in the late fourth century, and ornamented by his successor, some fifty years after its erection. It is a very simple, plain building of octagonal form, with the plainest of brickwork decoration upon it, and a delightful tent-shaped roof of red tiles.

Inside it is a perfect glow of colour and glorious decoration. The mosaics of Bishops Neon and Maximian still gleam as brilliantly as they did when first erected, and as a composition the whole scheme is wonderfully fine.

In the centre of the dome is a representation of the baptism, with the name of the river Jordan clearly marked, and then around this central circle is a still larger one with the twelve apostles, each bearing a crown and having his name near by.

These twelve figures are of surpassing dignity, and appear to move round this dome with a swing and grace that is very remarkable. They are rather tall and not so well proportioned as other mosaic figures which we shall see hereafter, but they are wonderful examples of such early work, and are specially interesting, inasmuch as they have never been restored and are in the condition in which their makers left them.

Below them is yet another circle of mosaic decoration also untouched, and representing the four books of the Gospels, open upon four altars, and between them four thrones of dominion with crosses. Around the baptistery are eight columns, and from them rise span-drills which are covered with mosaics of gold wreaths on a blue ground of grand effect, and between them, on oval backgrounds of gold, are eight prophets draped in white garments.

Above them rises another colonnade, composed of eight arches, each subdivided into three more, the central one of which contains a window and the two side ones figures in relief, which are probably made in a species of plaster-work.

From the tops of these eight large subdivided arches starts the band of mosaic work that contains the thrones and altars.

The mosaics on the arches that rise from the eight marble columns have been restored in 1897 and 1898 by the authorities in Florence, and therefore only the design and character of this work is genuine, but all the rest is untouched and the whole effect of this brilliant, sumptuous decoration is very wonderful.

There are four inscriptions around the baptistery in mosaic relating to baptism, and between some of the arches are set fine examples of porphyry and marble arranged in geometric pattern. In the centre is the huge font, which was intended for baptism by immersion, and to which is attached a curved ambo or pulpit in which the officiating priest would stand. The font is of white marble and has slabs of fine porphyry.

It will be noticed that this building is considerably below the level on which it was first erected, and the bases of the columns are to be found covered by the floor, which has been raised. This is a feature of buildings in Ravenna which will be constantly noticed, and is the result of the character of the soil, which is marshy and wet. This particular building is several feet below its right level and is still falling.

On its roof is to be seen, at the very apex, a metal cross bearing the following inscription, which records its erection by Archbishop Theodore in the later part of the seventh century : “Dedonis Dei et Scc Marie. F. F. Lerunt Temporibus dn Theodoro Apostolicvm.”

Near to the door can be traced the monogram of Bishop Neon.

Now cross the road and enter the ** cathedral, which in its foundation is as old as the baptistery, but has been so entirely altered and rebuilt that nothing of the exterior save the detached campanile remains of the original building. The interest of this building consists in what it contains, notably in the sacristy the ** ivory chair of St. Maximianus, which was made in the early part of the sixth century, and save for its being carried away to Venice in 1001 has been in this church ever since it was first made. It was certainly made by Orient craftsmen, and has in the front the monogram of Maximianus Episcopus, and around it fine delicate carvings of St. John the Baptist in front, the evangelists on the right and left, and the history of Joseph at the sides, and the miracles of Christ at the back.

Some of the panels are missing, and are replaced by poor copies; one of the missing panels is in Milan, and another in Rome; others are in Naples and in Pesaro, but it is not known what has become of the rest of them.

The carving is clear and well defined and full of character, and the panels are surrounded with delightful arabesque decoration of an excellent character. This chair is one of the great treasures of Europe, of exceptional interest, and should be carefully examined. Have it turned round so that you can see it well and appreciate its delightful work. The scenes of Joseph in Prison and In the House of Potiphar's Wife are especially quaint and interesting. Mark the peacocks in the border, and the excellent manner in which all the carving is undercut.

In the same sacristy are preserved the exquisite cope which belongs to San Giovanni Angeloptes, who was Archbishop of Ravenna in the fifth century, and which was remounted in the ninth or tenth century, and is of great beauty. The griffins and lambs on the cross of cloth of gold are delightful.

There is also to be seen the altar-cross of Sant' Agnello, archbishop in the sixth century, which is of silver and enamel, but it was altered in the sixteenth century, and only a part of what one can now see belongs to its very early history.

A more important relic of this archbishop is found standing close to the high altar, in the ancient processional cross of silver. This bears upon it in relief the Crucifixion, God the Eternal Father, the Madonna, St. John, and St. Mary Magdalen on one side; and on the other, St. Apollonia, and the symbols of the evangelists, with an inscription recording that the name of the engraver who decorated the ancient cross with these later reliefs in 1366 was Andrea.

Behind the altar will be found, fastened into the wall, two curved pieces of marble, which were, as the inscription upon them shows, part of the ancient ambo or chair used by Sant' Agnello in the original cathedral, in the sixth century; and also some pierced marble slabs that were over the remains of martyrs in the confession of the original cathedral, and which date back to the same remote time.

Then there are four splendid stone sarcophagi to be seen, two in the second chapel on the right, in which were buried St. Exuperantius and St. Maximianus (to whom the chair belonged), and two in the transept, in which were buried St. Barbatian, the confessor of Galla Placidia, and San Rinaldus. These are sixth-century coffins, having upon them the bay leaves of conquest and honour, the palms of victory, two saints bearing their coronals as an offering to Christ, and candles with the cross and the host on the ends.

We shall see many more of these splendid tombs ere we leave Ravenna, and recognize on them the love of symbolism which characterized their makers and the period in which they were made, and which was the method of teaching that was so needful in those early days.

Now turn round to the back of the cathedral, pass under an arch, up some stairs, and enter the **chapel of the archbishop, which is connected with the Duomo.

The anteroom through which you pass to gain the chapel is filled with ancient Roman remains and interesting early Christian inscriptions; and beyond it is the chapel.

St. Pier Cristologo was archbishop in the early part of the fifth century, and he it was who built this chapel and had it decorated in mosaics. His monogram, in the curious entwined arrangement that is so often to be seen in Ravenna, is to be found in mosaic in an arch of the chapel, and is composed of all the letters forming the word Petrus.

The mosaics in the ceiling of this chapel

are the original ones of the fifth century, and have only been repaired in places where some bits of the work have dropped out by reason of the damp.

There are four glorious angels, and opposite to them the four symbols of the evangelists; then there are two representations of the Christ with the twelve apostles, six on either side, and it should here be noted as a curious fact, that in these early Ravennese mosaics, the Apostle St. Paul is included with the twelve. The names are easily seen to be SS. John, James, Peter, Andrew, Philip, Bartholomew, Matthew, Thomas, James (the less), Thaddeus, Simon (Zelotes), and Paul, omitting Judas and Matthias.

Then on the right are six male saints, Damian, Fabian, Sebastian, Chrysanthus, Chrysologus, and Cassianus, and on the left six female saints, Cecilia, Eugenia, Eufemia, Felicitas, Perpetua, and Daria, with the sacred symbol between each three. The reason of the introduction of San Cassiano, was that he was the patron and protector of Imola, the good bishop's native place, and that consequently,

San Pier Cristologo had a peculiar devotion for that saint.

The faces are full of calm dignity, those of the Christ especially, and on the drapery are the words, "Ego Svm Via Veritas et Vita."

The ceiling has upon it crosses and birds, and the whole decoration is wonderful in beauty and effect.

Behind the altar are other mosaics of the Madonna in the centre, inscribed "Sca Maria," and two saints, one on either side, San Vitalis and Sant' Apollinaris. These are much later mosaics, belonging to the twelfth century, and were originally in the cathedral, whence they were brought to this chapel in 1796.

The frescoes, which are by Luca Longhi, are of no importance. To those who are interested in manuscripts it may be well to mention that on the floor above there is a small but very choice library of MSS. and papyri, but it is not well for any save experts to trouble to visit it, especially if you are pressed at all for time.

The pavement of the chapel is worth notice, as it is composed of that charming mingling of marble and porphyry that is known as "Opus Alexandrinum" and which was so popular at this period.

Following the chronological arrangement, it will be well for us, when we finally leave this group of fascinating buildings, to go to the north of the city into the Via San Vitale, and without entering this fine church yet, pass it by and go into the ** tomb of the Empress Galla Placidia, which lies behind it, and is also called the Church of San Nazaro e Celso.

I must warn you, however, that the mosaics in this interesting place are being restored, and that the building itself has been so restored and repaired as to present quite a fresh appearance, so that but little can be seen of the original edifice.

It is called "a well-preserved monument," and undoubtedly in some ways that is so, as the original idea of the place, its plan, its arrangement, can all be seen exactly as they have always been; but the "rifacimento" to which it has been exposed has taken away from the structure that feeling of antiquity that is so needful in order that the right impression may be made by a building.

It is said that in the repair of the mosaics only those portions that have dropped out are being supplied new, but it is more than that, as tesseræ are being used in the new work that are of a kind which the old mosaicists never used; the colours are of a different tone from the old ones, and the work is more rigid, exact, and true than was the old, and so much the more mechanical. Even if it were not so, new work can never be the same as old. It is a copy of what has preceded it. It is not the original creation of the artist's mind, and although it is not difficult for us to fully appreciate the desire of the Ravennese to repair the destruction caused by the damp, yet it seems better to us to allow the damage to be seen and recognized than to spend great sums in making it up, and so take away from the entire scheme that charm of untouched antiquity that it possessed for so long a period. The constant visits of tourists to Ravenna have not done the place any good, and now the work of renovation is going on in the city at so great a rate that soon there will be little left that has not been restored. There is no doubt that in the past these monuments have suffered much, and that they will be glorious in the future, brave with fine marble and mosaic, but they will be copies of what has been rather than grand and impressive originals; and where it is difficult if not impossible to tell what has been repaired and what has not, the whole work is likely to suffer in public estimation, and I think rightly so.

Outside, the tomb has been scraped and done up; inside the walls remain very much as they were as far as the springing of the arches, but the workmen are now covering up the bare walls with slabs of Siena marble, restoring the walls, as they inform you, to what was their original condition of beauty. The cupola is covered entirely with mosaic which was a few years ago untouched, but is now being "touched up," as it is called; mingled with the old work is modern mosaic, which is brilliant and showy.

The designs certainly are the old ones and are very fine, and much of the mosaic is old. In the dome is a cross in the centre upon a ground of blue stars, and at the four corners of the dome are the symbols of the evangelists grandly presented. Over the door is Christ as "The Good Shepherd;" and opposite to it, behind the altar (which at this moment is put away in San Vitale while the work is going on), is another representation of Our Lord casting heretical books into a fire, so contrasting two of the main elements of faith — that of love for the sheep and that of condemnation of error. Around are figures of the prophets or apostles, probably the latter. The influence of classic art is very clearly to be seen, especially in the two doves drinking from the vase, which is a thoroughly classical device; and also in the stags at a fountain, and in the arabesque decoration of the ornaments around the arches and within their vaults.

The little chapel is a wonderful glow of colour, and, with all its restoration, we must be thankful that so fine an example is left of the work of the mosaicist. We can feel the influence of the Oriental love of colour, implanted upon the classical ideas of fine design, and in its deep jewel-like blue, its solemn dull red, its gold circles, its masses of pure unearthly white, it seems to shine as with the fierceness of fire, and the light travels over its broken surface revealing new charms with every fresh position.

It is but a tiny chapel, but it contains, besides its mosaics, the tombs of two Cæsars, the only ones of all that long line of rulers which now stand in the position in which they were originally placed; and at the end, near to the stone sarcophagi of Honorius II. and Constantius II., is the tomb of Galla Placidia herself, who built the chapel. She herself used to rest within that tomb, and there for eleven hundred years she sat, robed in state, and wearing her crown, but as the Renaissance crept into Italy, she — emblem of an earlier art — perished through the carelessness of some children, who in 1577 introduced a lighted candle into her tomb, through the hole that may yet be seen at the side, and in a moment everything was consumed — empress, robes, cypress wood chair, and all. Now there only remains the huge stone sarcophagus, those of the two emperors and two others, one of which has the bones of young Honoria, daughter of Galla Placidia.

Ravenna owes other buildings to the genius of Galla Placidia, who was sister to Honorius, and who, having been the wife of the Gothic king, had as her second husband, Constantius III., whose son became Valentinian III.

She founded the Church of San Giovanni Evangelista in 420, out of gratitude for preservation during a storm on a voyage from Byzantium to her capital, Ravenna; but beyond some fragments to be found in a chapel dedicated to St. Bartolomeo, there is nothing of the church of her period to be seen.

The relief over the door of St. Giovanni Evangelista, which commemorates the vow, is of thirteenth or fourteenth century date, but contains in it a part, although small, of the far older stone which may have been contemporary with the church. Inside on the left of the entrance in the corner is an ancient marble chair, which belonged to the Abbot Benevento, of 1267; and near to it is a curious terra-cotta group of the Madonna and Child with angels, belonging to the sixteenth century.

The marbles in this church and in the one of San Giovanni Battista in the Via Girolamo Rossi, which Galla Placidia erected for her confessor, St. Barbatian, whose sarcophagus we saw in the Duomo, are of great beauty, especially some of verde antico, which are at the altar of this latter church. The campanile of San Giovanni Battista should also be noticed, as it is an ancient one, and belongs to the original church; but the interior of the church has been so modernized as to be hardly worth attention, and it is in fact only the campanile outside and the marbles inside that make it worth attention.

Galla Placidia built also Santa Croce, which stands close to her tomb, and in which she worshipped, but which is now not worth visiting; its campanile alone stands to recall its founder. Her medals and coins can be seen in the museum, as she held imperial power for awhile, and exercised a very real and determined sovereignty over her people in Ravenna.

The Church of *San Francesco, which stands close to the hotel, is another building well worth notice, and if evidence is needed as to the soil on which Ravenna stands, and of the imminent danger that threatens some of the buildings in the city, let me recommend you to look down into the crypt under this fine church, which will be found actually full of water.

The sights of this church are not many.

the chief perhaps being the tomb of San Liberio, which is the altar of the chapel at the extremity of the right aisle, and which is a sculptured sarcophagus of the late fourth century. It is still used, as it has always been, so conservative is the Church in Ravenna; and on the altar, the Mass is said in the same fashion in the twentieth century as it was when first the saint was buried there, and with the same words.

The slab of dark red Verona marble that is upon the floor close to the entrance door, dated 1331, seems quite modern beside the other treasures of the place. It commemorates a lord of Ravenna, one Ostasio Polenta, who, being a tertiary of the Franciscan Order, was buried in the habit of the Order, and is so represented on his tomb. His face is worth attention; it is a very fine piece of sculpture. The name of that family will always be remembered in connection with their kindness to Dante and also for the fact that Francesca da Rimini was the daughter of Guido da Polenta and a descendant of this Ostasio.

The general of the Order, who died in Ravenna of fever in 1405, is buried on the left of the church, and a similar slab of marble covers his tomb. He was over ninety years of age, as the inscription states, and yet it says that his death was very unexpected, and he himself anticipated a much longer life!

All the marble in this church is worth notice, especially the two lovely columns at the chapel of the cross, the second on the right. San Francesco is a very popular church in Ravenna, and will be found thronged with people at the early masses, and engaging the attention of numerous priests; and on the great festivals of the saint, notably on 1st and 2d of August, the church is almost inaccessible by reason of the people who crowd it for the "Perdono di San Francesco."

The Church of Sant' Agata in the Via Mazzini dates from about the same period, having been erected by Bishop Exuperantius in the fifth century, and bearing his monogram cut into the second column on the left. The similar monograms of two other archbishops, Sergio and Agnello, can be seen in the archway of the altar in the nave to the right. Both of these saints are buried beneath the altar. The pulpit is from a pagan building and appears to have been cut from a piece of a marble column. It was, it is said, discovered in the ground close by the church at the time of the erection of the building.

This church is principally notable for the beauty of the marbles that it contains, which comprise bigio antico, cipollino, porphyry, granite, and several fine Greek marbles; the capitals of the columns are also well worth attention, and some of them are of considerable importance.

We must pass on, however, to another period of the history of the town, and see what there is that recalls the Ostrogoths and their Emperor Theodoric in Ravenna.

PALACE OF THEODORIC, RAVENNA.

CHAPTER III.

THE TIME OF THEODORIC IN RAVENNA

OF the * palace in which Theodoric once dwelt there is but little to be seen. The ruined walls, for they are no more, are close to the Hotel Byron in the Corso Garibaldi, straight up from the hotel. There is only left a great massive wall with some marble columns, eight above and two below, supporting the brickwork, and some crumbling walls and remains of arches and windows behind it. All that was good was carried away by Charlemagne when he visited Ravenna, and all the fine marble columns (in this city of fine and rare marbles) were taken off and dragged away across Italy to Aix-la-Chapelle, and placed in the new cathedral which Charles the Great was erecting, and which now is one of the most interesting buildings in Germany, and the only one that has to do with the period which can be studied in Ravenna. Marble and mosaics, porphyry and bronze, carved stone, ivory and silver work, all were carried away to Aachen, and nothing now remains since the eighth century, when Charlemagne came to Ravenna, to tell us of the home of Theodoric but these bare walls, and a porphyry bath that we shall see in the museum.

Of the work of Theodoric there is much evidence remaining, and it is of a splendid character.

A dozen yards from the palace stands the **cathedral which Theodoric built for his Arian bishops.

The very mention of this great heresy shows how strangely Ravenna has seemed to crystallize around itself events and controversies that the rest of Europe has forgotten.

The whole nation of the Ostrogoths was Arian in its belief. Arius had long been dead, the Councils of Nicæa and of Constantinople had been held, and had pronounced against his heresy. Athanasius had fulminated his thunders against it, the Nicene doctrine had been confirmed, and within the Church the heresy could no longer be said to exist; but it rested longer outside the Catholic Church, and now that the influence of Theodoric became the paramount power in Ravenna, Arianism began to raise its head.

Theodoric was but thirty-three years master of Ravenna, and therefore his cathedral was consecrated very soon after its erection by Sant' Agnello the Archbishop, for Catholic uses, but it and the baptistery, which we shall shortly visit, were originally erected for Arians to use.

The cathedral is called Sant' Apollinare Nuovo, but originally it was dedicated to San Martino, and we shall soon have proof of that fact. It was "new" more than a thousand years ago! In its time the bones of the saint whose name it now bears rested far away in Classis, whence they were removed (or said to have been removed, as some of the historians state) for fear of capture by the Saracens; but now they rest again, according to the best of belief, under the altar of the church at Classis, in whose crypt the bones were first laid.

The church has, however, lost its older name and retained its later one, and as the New Sant' Apollinare we shall visit it. It is bare and plain on the outside, with a simple dignified campanile, but the interior is the finest in all Ravenna.

It is hardly possible to conceive of anything more wonderful in the way of decoration or more beautiful than the long line of saints and virgins which stretches from end to end of the church. The saints are headed by St. Martin, and move forward in rhythmic array towards Our Lord, who is seated on a throne attended with angels, at the end of the long frieze that extends over the arches. There are, after St. Martin, SS. Clement, Sixtus, Laurence, Cyprian, Paul, Vitalis, Gervasius, Protasius, Hippolytus, Cornelius, Cassianus, John, Ursinus, Namor, Felix, Apollinaris, Demetrius, Polycarp, Vincent and Pancras, Chrysogonus, Protus, Jovenius, and Sabinus, names which recall the very early church and some of the sainted bishops of this very see.

Then opposite to them is a long line of virgins, twenty-one in number, who bear crowns, which they are bringing up to Our Lady, who, in similar fashion to the Christ opposite, is seated on a throne and attended by angels.

The virgins are SS. Eugenia, Savina,

MOSAIC IN SANT' APOLLINARE NUOVO, RAVENNA.

Christina, Anatolia, Victor, Paulina, (?) Daria, Anastasia, Justina, Felicitas, Perpetua, Agnes with her Lamb, Vincentia, Valeria, Crispina, Lucia, Cecilia, Eulalia, Agatha, Pelagia, and Eufemia.

At the opposite ends are, on the side with the virgins, a representation of the city of Classis with ships and the sea, and on the other side, with the procession of saints, the palace of Theodoric, with the word Palatium, and the Church of San Vitale.

The procession of virgins is headed by the Magi, who are hastening forward with their gifts.

The figures of Our Lord and Our Lady are very similar in style. Christ has his hand upraised, in the act of benediction, and the Virgin bears in her arms the Infant Child. Both are seated and are attended by four angels, grand stately figures in white draperies.

Above these long processions are windows, and between them tall mosaic figures of apostles and teachers, and then above that again are two long series of scenes from the life of Christ as follows: The Cenacolo, Mount of Olives, Betrayal, Denial, Sanhedrim, Judgment of Herod, Second Denial, Judas and the Bag, Pilate, Calvary, the Entombment, the Scene at Emmaus, Christ in the Midst of His Disciples; and then on the other side as follows: The Healing of the Cripple, the Herd of Swine, the Healing of the Paralytic, the Parable of the Sheep and Goats, the Calling of St. Matthew, the Pharisee and the Publican, the Raising of Lazarus, the Woman of Samaria, the Woman with an Issue of Blood, the Blind Man Healed, the Draught of Fishes, and the Feeding of the Multitude (two scenes).

These mosaics have been from time to time repaired, but a most careful account has been kept of all that has been done, and a large drawing of the entire mosaic has been prepared by the government officials in which, by means of different colours, every piece of repair is noted and can be distinguished.

In looking at this important record, which has been drawn with the utmost skill, and from close examination of the mosaic, I was much interested to notice that the repair and alteration in the two large groups of the Christ and the Madonna have been very few, and that practically that part of the mosaic remains as it was when first erected by Theodoric 1300 years ago! The heads of the three Magi, part of the heads of two of the angels on one side, a portion of the draperies of two of the angels on the other side, and a small part of the throne are all the portions that have been restored, so that this triumphant representation of the Christ and the Madonna, in which Our Lady is enthroned as is her Son, and in which she is given the Gospel side of the altar, stands as it did when erected in those early days, and shows the teaching of the Catholic Church in the fifth and sixth centuries with an absolutely unerring proof.

Further evidence of the immense antiquity of all this work is to be marked in the fact that the crucifixion is not included at all in the scenes depicted, as in the beginning of the history of the Church a representation of this dread event was never given. The scenes from the life of Our Lord above the windows have received no restoration at all, and are entirely original. The whole effect of this sumptuous decoration is very wonderful, and can be compared with nothing else in Northern Italy.

Even at Monreale or in Palermo, where other superb mosaic work is to be found, nothing will be found so dignified, so impressive as these sweeping processions of saints and angels, and the grand stately figures above them, and the Biblical stories so quaintly set forth.

The church is worth returning to again and again, and if it is visited on a sunny day, the glow and sheen of this mosaic work will never be forgotten.

The pulpit is worth notice for its curious early Christian sculptures; and in the last chapel on the left will be found a sort of museum which contains a fine portrait of Justinian in mosaic, the tenth-century marble chair of the abbot who ruled in the church, a perforated screen that originally protected the remains of St. Apollinaris in the confession, and some fine examples of marble and porphyry.

When we leave the Church of Sant' Apollinare Nuovo, it will be well for us to visit the other important buildings that were founded at the same time by Theodoric, e. g. the baptistery of the Arians, which is now called Santa Maria in Cosmedin, and the Church of San Spirito, called also San Teodoro.

They are close together, and stand in a small street, Via Paolo Costa, just out of the Corso Garibaldi, three minutes' walk from the church that we have just left.

There is nothing special to be seen in Santo Spirito save some columns of fine marble which have curious capitals bearing Latin crosses, and it may be well here to draw attention to the marbles that are to be found all over Ravenna in almost every church, as no city in Italy with the exception of Rome has such fine examples of the rarer ** marbles.

There is a little book called "The Handbook of Ancient Roman Marbles," by H. W. Pullen (Murray, 2s. 6d.), which ought to be in the hand of every traveller in Italy, and which will be found of special interest in Ravenna. Murray's Handbook names many of the rarer marbles of Ravenna, such as the eighteen columns of Imezio, four of bigio antico, two of cipollino, and four of the very rare cipollino rosso, which are all in the Duomo, and by the aid of it and this little book the tourist will find a new interest in tracing out the names of other beautiful marbles which adorn the churches of Ravenna. There was a great demand for the more precious marbles in these churches, and it is well to look at them, as generally they are quite lovely and often of the greatest rarity.

In this particular church in which we now are there are columns of bigio antico in different varieties, lovely gray marbles with blackish, bluish, and smoky-gray mottlings; but besides these columns the only special thing to see is the ancient pulpit in the fourth chapel on the left, which was probably an ambo rather than a pulpit, from which the Gospel was read.

The portico rests upon three columns, of which two are Istrian marble, and the other from Greece. One of the inside columns is of that lovely marble known as Verde Sanguigno, which is a green serpentine with stains of blood red. The church was originally dedicated by Theodoric to his patron San Teodorico, but in the time of Archbishop Sant' Agnello was restored to the Catholic Church, consecrated, and dedicated to Santo Spirito.

Opposite to it is the baptistery which belongs to it, still called the Baptistry of the Arians, but which also was renamed when consecrated as Santa Maria in Cosmedin,—that is, “ornamented.” There is nothing to see in the interior save the fine mosaic which covers the dome, and represents the baptism of Christ in the Jordan. These mosaics were erected after the baptistery became Catholic, and date therefore from about 560. The river is depicted as a pagan river god holding an urn from which the water issues, and the Christ is standing in it. All around, as in the other baptistery, are the apostles, including St. Paul, each of them carrying his crown of glory and martyrdom, save the two apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, one bearing the keys and the other the sword. They are moving around the circle towards an altar which is throne-like, and has a cushion and a cross upon it.

The ancient font has disappeared, having been cut up, it is said, when the other baptistery was taken over for use, in order that there should be baptism at no other place than in the chief baptistery, and that all should be done canonically. The slabs that formed this font were used in the decoration of other churches in the place.

Finally let us go out and see the ** Tomb of Theodoric, called also Santa Maria della Rotunda, as that too was converted into a church. It is about half a mile from the gates of the city going out from the Porta Serrata, and is a very prominent object as the train comes into Ravenna. It cannot fail to be seen, as from its great size and unusual appearance it is very noticeable. It stands now in a small garden and has a custodian of its own, who charges a small fee for admission to it.

It was erected, as I have already said, by the daughter of Theodoric, Amalasuntha, who appealed to Justinian for protection after her father's death. It is a very mysterious building; and little is known of its history.

The great mass of Istrian stone which covers its roof is a marvel in itself, as its huge size and weight (nearly five hundred tons) must have rendered the operation of placing it in position one of supreme difficulty.

The inscriptions upon it have been added at a later time, and there is no evidence for the story that at one time there stood statues of the twelve apostles upon this roof, on the projecting perforated handles that are round about the mass. The word that we have used by which to designate these projections probably is the right one, and they were used, we believe, to move the great stone into its position. Beneath the stone is the sepulchral chamber in which at one time the bones of the great monarch were deposited, but in the revulsion of feeling that followed upon his death, and when all his churches were consecrated to the Catholic faith and the heresy of Arianism exterminated, the remains of the emperor were taken from his tomb and buried elsewhere.

Beneath this room is another, in the form of a cross, with an interesting west doorway, which was, it is believed, intended as a burying-place for other members of the royal house, and was actually used as the place of sepulture for certain notable personages. It has been recently cleared of the water that for years filled it, and can now be readily inspected. To architects it will offer some interesting evidence of the method of vaulting an arch adopted in the days of its erection, and of the admirable manner in which the doorway is arranged by means of huge stones notched and double notched into one another.

Every arch is erected in this way, and the whole is built with the greatest ingenuity and strength.

The stairway by which one ascends to the upper room was added within the past century, but originally there was a sort of colonnade around this upper part, portions of which yet remain and are to be found inside the sepulchre. It is not known how access originally was given to the upper room.

The huge roof was cracked by lightning, and in this way the accuracy was proclaimed, it is said, of an old legend which foretold the death of the monarch by lightning; as the flash destroyed most of his remains and the cypress-wood chair in which the emperor was seated in his robes, and left only bones remaining, which a few months afterwards were scattered in other burying-places, by the zeal of those who extirpated his heresy.

The tomb now stands as a dignified erection, imposing in its size and strength, and in the summer, when encircled with creepers and surrounded by flowers, it is a peculiarly beautiful sight, and seems then to belong far more to the living than to the dead.

The period of the time of Theodoric in Ravenna is the most important of its history as regards the prosperity of the people. He was a man of the sternest impartiality, a great lover of truth and justice, an upright warrior, an honourable ruler. He took great interest in his people, encouraged them in their enterprises, assisted them in the cultivation of their fields with loans of money, and with protection and labour, and during the few years in which he resided in Ravenna the place flourished. This great massive tomb is a fitting emblem of so strong, so resolute, and so noble a monarch, who, but for his unfortunate attachment to a deadly heresy, would have been one of the greatest monarchs that the times had produced.

CHAPTER IV.

JUSTINIAN AND THEODORA

SUCCEEDING upon the times of Theodoric came, as we have already seen, the rule of the Roman Emperor Justinian, and to that time belong the three remaining buildings which we must visit in search of mosaics.

The archbishop of the see was Sant' Ecclesio, and the first church that he appears to have had erected was Santa Maria Maggiore, in the Via Gaetano Monti; but save for some fine marble columns and a curious seventh-century ambo or pulpit there is nothing of importance in this church, and its campanile is all that remains of the original structure.

Close to it, however, stands the fine Church of ** San Vitale, which the same archbishop built on the site of the martyrdom of San Vitale, and which was consecrated by a succeeding archbishop, St. Maximian.

It contains the finest mosaics in Ravenna,

and will, when the present work is completed, be specially remarkable. It is always somewhat distressing to find a church in the hand of the restorer, but in the case of San Vitale the work is being done so carefully, and the additions to the original structure were of such surpassing ugliness and covered up so much fine work, that very much of the customary discontent is not only driven away when the work is examined, but is turned into approval.

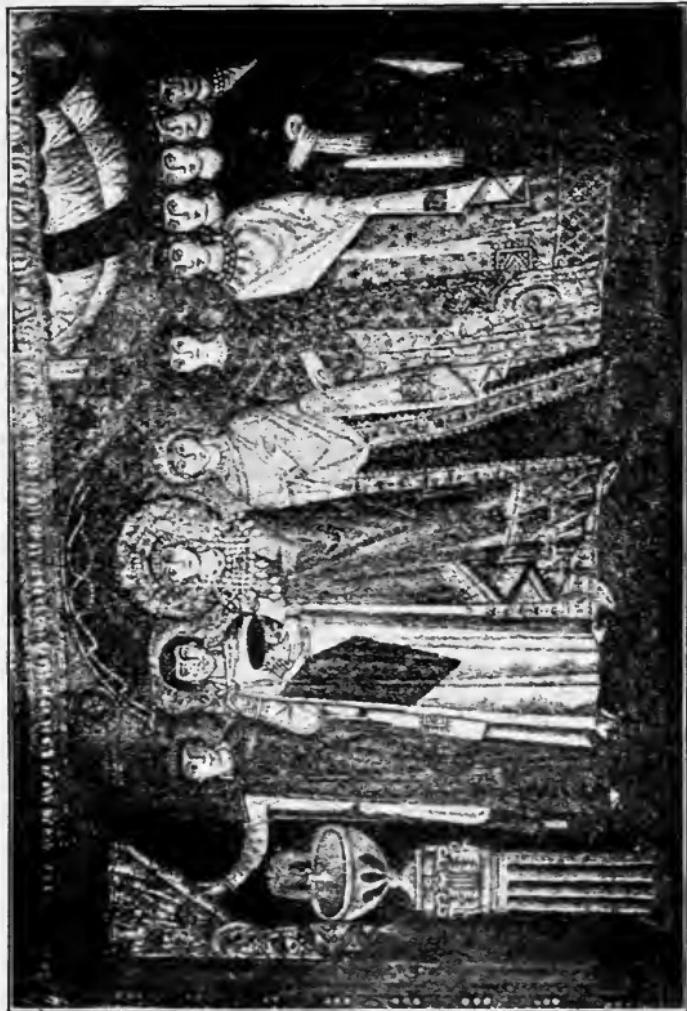

The architect, a learned Professor Bocci, has made many important discoveries in the church, revealing much of the older work that had become covered up, and showing which was the original entrance, besides exposing some decoration of great merit; and as, on account of the wet, it was needful to do something with the church, it is well that the repair has fallen into such good hands.

The hideous painting which now disfigures the interior will, I hope, be removed. There is a petition being made to the government to order this work to be done, and in the interests of the building, it will I hope be successful.

The church is octagonal, with a choir, and has eight fine pillars, which divide the central space from what may be termed the ambulatory. These columns are adorned with capitals of great merit and beauty, and those above them in the second story are still finer. The lower part of the columns is covered with fine slabs of marble, which have been reversed by later builders, and set against one another to form huge splayed patterns, and in this way the decorative value of the original work has been set at naught. It is possible, now that the work is in progress, to ascend not only into the upper story, from which the best view of many of the mosaics is obtained, but higher, even into the roof, and so appreciate the extreme ingenuity with which the building was erected, and the splendid manner in which the work was done. The roof is circular, as is in fact the whole church above the upper story.

It is, however, in the choir that the chief interest of this church consists, and in the mosaics that adorn it. They were done in the early sixth century, and have been tampered with but very little. They differ materially from the mosaics in the baptistery, into which we first went and which are a century older; as the former are bolder, stronger, and more in broad full outline than are these, which are fuller of detail and finish, and devote much more attention to features and ornaments.

The most remarkable ones are inside the apse at the back of the altar, which, as in all these early churches, stands out away from the wall in the chord of the arch.

On the left is the Emperor Justinian, holding a sort of basket in which are gifts, and having on one side of him the archbishop with two attendant priests, and on the other two attendants in white and some soldiers. The archbishop holds a cross in his hands, and the priests with him hold the book of the Gospels and the censer, and are evidently deacon and subdeacon.

Opposite to this panel is another one depicting the famous Empress Theodora bringing her chalice or cup of gifts, and attended by her ladies, who are clad in rich costumes, and by two acolytes, to whom she is handing her gifts for them to present at the altar.

The colouring of these superb mosaics is splendid, as clear and as fresh as when first done, and glowing with light.

In the apse itself is Our Lord between two angels, St. Vitale standing on His right and receiving from a seraph a crown of glory, and on the left St. Eutychius presenting the Church to Christ.

On the arch are Our Lord and His apostles, with SS. Gervasius and Protasius, sons of San Vitale, of whom we spoke when in their church in Milan, which is now called Sant' Ambrogio.

Close to the altar above the two beautiful columns with fine perforated heads are other scenes :

On the right the offerings of Abel and Melchizedek; Moses tending the sheep of his father-in-law; Moses on Mount Horeb; and Moses taking off the shoes from his feet at the burning bush, a hand in the sky denoting the Father.

Opposite to them are: The Sacrifice of Abraham; the Angels who visited Abraham and Sarah; Moses on Mount Sinai.

There are also the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah, and the four evangelists with their emblems.

The ancient Greek relief called the "Throne of Neptune," which is to be seen close to these mosaics, is on the right, the one opposite to it being a copy made at a recent date. The original one is very fine and full of power and dignity. The splendid columns of this church are all worth examination, not only because of the beauty of the marble, but also for the sake of the delightful openwork capitals which surmount them.

Having finished the inspection of the Church of San Vitale, it will be well for you to obtain a carriage at the hotel, and drive out to the grand old Church of ** Sant' Apollinare-in-Classe, telling the driver to take you on your way homewards to the Church of ** Santa Maria-in-Porto Fuori, which will be described in the next chapter. When you have looked at these churches you will only have the museum and picture-gallery left, and the tomb of Dante, and having examined them you will be able to rest with the assurance that you have seen all the chief sights of this fascinating city.

We will therefore journey off together now to the site of the ancient town of Classis, which we saw depicted in mosaic in the Church of Sant' Apollinare Nuovo, and about which I have already given you some information. We have to drive some three and a half miles towards Rimini, across a wide, flat, marshy plain, in the midst of which now stands this fine church, the sole remaining building of the once important port of Classis.

At one time all the plain between the two cities was filled with habitations, and the important city of Cæsarea occupied the district that was between Ravenna and Classis, almost touching its neighbour on either hand. Now all is gone, and of Cæsarea nothing that was in its great basilica of San Lorenzo remains on the site, and only some splendid columns which stand in the Church of Santa Maria-in-Porto remain of all its treasures. The basilica stood till the sixteenth century, but was then destroyed, and now the site of Cæsarea is a bare plain.

As soon as we cross the Ponte Nuovo, which is over the united rivers of the Ronco and the Montone, and was erected by the Cardinal Legate Alberoni, we get a sight of the imposing basilica to which we are going, and as we drive up at its doors and look at its very bare uninteresting front, we are given no idea whatever of the splendour that is within.

It is well to notice over the doorway that there still remain the Roman bronze hooks that were used to support the velarium, or curtain, that at one time, for great festivals, spread itself over the entrance. It is also well to mark the great campanile, stately and simple, and peculiarly Ravennese in its structure and in the severity of its architecture. It was probably erected more as a watch-tower and ornamental structure, and perhaps partly as a place of retreat that would be strong, than for the purpose for which such towers are now erected; as bells did not come into use for a century after. We may well look upon it mainly as a watch-tower.

On entering the church (which is readily opened by the old man or woman who seem to be the only inhabitants of this deserted spot), we shall be at once struck by the majesty and dignity of its size and proportions. The walls are green with damp, and the church has a strangely deserted and forlorn look, standing as it now does, far away from all population, a monument of times long passed away. I would recommend you on entering to retain your cloak or coat, and even to put on extra covering, as the interior is often very cold, and a chill can be quickly taken within its walls.

Go forward at once to the high altar and look at the mosaics that adorn the apse. They are the latest that we have yet seen, but the word "late" in Ravenna only means the sixth century, and these splendid mosaics are considerably over a thousand years old. Very little indeed has ever been done to these mosaics, and they shine out to-day as they did when first erected twelve hundred years ago. They are extraordinarily full of symbolism.

The upper part is said to represent a symbolic treatment of the Transfiguration, or of the appearance of the Divine Son. The face of Christ is to be seen in the centre of a large cross which stands upon a blue star-studded sky, and pointing towards it is visible a hand which typifies God the Father. Above the cross is the Greek sacred monogram, on its arms the letters Alpha and Omega, and at its foot the words "Salus Mundi." Moses and Elijah occupy places on either side, and the three sheep below typify the apostles SS. Peter, James, and John. In the centre can be seen the patron saint of Ravenna and Classis,

MOSAIC. — SACRIFICES OF THE OLD LAW.

Sant' Apollinare, preaching to the faithful, represented as a flock of sheep.

The figures between the windows are four of the greatest early archbishops of the see, Saints Ecclesius, Servius, Ursus, and Ursicinus.

The scenes on the left and right wall are as follows: On the right are the sacrifices of the Old Law, those of Abel with the Lamb, Melchizedek with Bread and Wine, and Abraham with his Son.

Opposite is the demand of Archbishop Reparatus from the Emperor Constantinus IV., for freedom for his diocese, a demand which the emperor, attended by Heraclius and Tiberius, granted, as represented by the scroll which he is handing to the courageous bishop with the word "Privilegia" upon it. This mosaic is later still than the other, having been put up in 668.

On the rood arch are yet other mosaics depicting the Christ with the evangelists (represented by their symbols); the cities of Jerusalem and Bethlehem, from which flocks of the faithful (as sheep) are ascending towards our Lord; and below the archangels St.

Michael and St. Gabriel, St. Matthew and St. Luke, and some splendid decorative borders. Before leaving the elevated altar notice the ancient throne of another sainted archbishop, St. Damianus (688 - 705), which has been cut in half and used to form the ends of the sedilia for the clergy, on either side of the high altar. The baldacchino of the altar is modern, but the four columns which support it are of a rare black and white ancient marble from Egypt, which is of great beauty in its markings. It is well also to notice the long Latin inscriptions which are all around the wall of the choir, and which relate the story of the church and the events which attended the removal of the remains of the patron saint from this church into Ravenna and back again.

It is unfortunately impossible to enter the crypt, which is one of great beauty, the columns supporting the roof and the pavement being particularly interesting, and of fine and rare marble; but the whole crypt is full of water even up to the step of the doorway, and care must be taken when you look in at the door that forms the entrance to this crypt that you do not step down into the unwholesome green liquid. There is a splendid bronze grating in the crypt.

Here also is the urn in which at one time were the remains of the saint, but they now rest safely below the stone of the altar. For a long period these precious bones were buried in a sort of confession which is in the centre of the nave, and which takes the form of a small altar, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, which was erected in the sixth century by Archbishop Saint Maximianus, but in the twelfth century the remains were transferred to the crypt.

All around the walls can be seen the portraits of the various archbishops of this important see of Ravenna, 132 in number, down to the latest occupant of the see. Some of these portraits were originally in mosaic, and below them were splendid marble slabs, all of which were carried off in the middle of the fifteenth century by Sigismondo Malatesta when he was erecting the famous temple at Rimini. The present portraits were painted after that time in order to commemorate as far as possible the original series of mosaic ones, and have been added to from time to time ever since.

The splendid marble sarcophagi all around the church will attract attention. There are ten in all. The first is of San Teodoro, who lived in 688, above which in the wall is an inscription relating the benefits conferred upon the church by Leo III. The second has upon it the representation of Our Lord and the twelve apostles. The third is that of Grazioso (784 - 788), the fourth that of John VIII. (777 - 784). The fifth is an unknown one of the sixth century, and has two peacocks upon it. The seventh is that of St. Felix (706 - 723), and is an important work. The eighth is a seventh-century one, and near it is a celebrated inscription commemorating the penance of Otho III., who passed forty days in this basilica. The ninth is an unknown one, and the tenth is that of John V. (607 - 613).

Behind the second, on the left, is the place in which for a time the bones of Sant' Apollinare were hidden in the wall, as the inscription commemorates.

At the entrance to the chapel which stands at the end of the left aisle is a curious tabernacle, which is said to belong to the seventh century, and is now over a fifteenth-century altar, which was erected, as the inscription tells us, by one Petrus, a priest, in honour of Sant' Eleucadio, third archbishop of the see.

The basis of the columns which support the nave arches will be found far below the level of the present floor, and their lovely gray colour should also be noticed as distinctly worthy of attention.

The splendid pine wood, or Pineta, which lies beyond Classis, is worth visiting, if you have plenty of time; or part of it will be seen from the rail if you travel on from Ravenna to Rimini. It has been celebrated for centuries, partly because of its position in the midst of this dreary flat marsh, and partly for the great beauty of many of its oldest trees. Dante sang of the beauties of this Pineta, and Boccaccio made it the scene of many of his stories. It is full of attraction for the artist, but situated as it is in the midst of a malarious district, the greatest care must be taken by persons who desire to settle for awhile under its magnificent trees, and use its charms as the inspiration for their pictures. We will now leave Classis thinking of all that the city has seen, and remembering that once here rode at anchor the greatest fleets of the Roman Empire, where now there are but a few cottages and a great and magnificent, but lonely and deserted church.

CHAPTER V.

FRESCO - WORK — MUSEUMS AND PICTURE-GALLERY

THE fresco-work in Ravenna is not of any special extent or of very great importance, but it must not be overlooked.

We know that between 1317 and 1320 Giotto stayed at Ravenna with his friend Dante, who had taken refuge in the place, and the great artist has left behind him many marks of his residence. The Church of Santa Maria-in-Porto Fuori, to which we drive as we turn from Classis back into Ravenna, was said at one time to be decorated throughout by the frescoes of Giotto and two of his pupils, who worked with him in the church.

The decoration was the gift of a notary, one Graziadeo, who, in 1246, provided a sum of money to defray the work in this church to which he had a peculiar devotion, owing to his close attachment to the Holy House of Loreto, which at that time had control of the building. It is known that Maso da Faenza, Rastello of Forli, and a Ravenna artist, one Giovanni, worked in the church, but nothing can be definitely proved as to the work of Giotto himself, although the character of much of the decoration that remains would indicate his hand, or at least his instruction.

The following may be suggested as the subjects of the frescoes that remain, but many of them have so perished that it is not easy to determine what they represent. The work of Giotto himself, will, I think, be found in the choir.

On a wall to the left in the nave are a Madonna and Child with four saints, and also St. Julian.

The Redeemer is in the centre of the rood arch. Antichrist and the Martyrdom of certain saints are on one side, and on the other are the angels cutting off the head of Antichrist, and below are the scenes of the blessed and the condemned. There are also the heads of San Ciriaco of Ancona and San Zeno of Verona.

On the ceiling of the choir are frescoes of the evangelists with their symbols, and the doctors of the Church. On the right wall are the coronation, the death, and the assumption of the Madonna, and near by, Our Lord instituting holy communion, the massacre of the innocents, and a scene representing a monk and a lady in a balcony, supposed to represent St. Francis and St. Clare.

On the left wall are the birth and presentation of the Madonna, in which the last two figures on the right are said to be portraits of Giotto and of Guido da Polenta, the protector of Dante.

In the left chapel are frescoes of Pope Giovanni asking permission of Theodoric to build a church; the imprisonment of the Pope for disobedience to the orders of the emperor, and the martyrdom of some unknown saint.

In the right chapel the frescoes represent St. John baptizing a king; the preaching of San Pier degli Onesti, and his consolation of the suffering and troubled people; scenes from the life of St. Matthew, his call, martyrdom, and death; and figures of angels and saints.

At the end of the apse are the three Maries and the unbelief of St. Thomas, and in front of the chancel arch are portraits of Sant' Apollinare and Sant' Antonio Abate.

The depth to which the church has sunk in the soft marshy ground can be seen by examining the bases of the columns, and as the whole church is very damp and malarious, it is not advisable to stay long in it, or to enter it without an extra wrap.

The campanile will attract attention as it rises out of the remains of an ancient Roman pharos, or fire-house, the primitive lighthouse that was used to guide the ships into the neighbouring port of Classis.

Having looked at these quaint and almost perished works, and remarked on the curious plaster relief halos which the saints bear, and the naïve and attractive way in which the stories are so simply and yet so decisively told, let us drive back into the city to the Church of San Giovanni Evangelista into which we have already been and examine the ** frescoes in the fourth chapel on the left, which are most certainly by Giotto, and are all that remain of his work inside the city walls. They represent the evangelists and the doctors of the Church, and are of unusual interest, although in places they have been touched up. The figure of St. Matthew mending his pen is quite delightful, and all the others are full of quaint conceits which cannot fail to recall the Arena frescoes. The figures are those of SS. Augustine, Ambrose, Gregory, and Jerome, and the evangelists, SS. Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John.

We have not much space in which to describe the museums of Ravenna, and fortunately for us they do not demand as much space as those of other towns save for one or two special things.

In the first room in the gallery the two works by Rondinello are the only important ones, and they are quite beautiful, especially the one with the Madonna and Child, SS. Catherine and Jerome.

Rondinello was a pupil of Bellini, and worked much at Ravenna and at Forli near by. His colour is sweet and good and his pictures are well composed.

There are two works of Luca Longhi in this room.

In the next is a crowded and powerful Vasari, entirely lacking in pathos.

A little farther on we enter the room which contains one of the treasures of Ravenna, the ** recumbent statue of Guidarello Guidarelli, by Tullio Lombardo. As there is a small pamphlet issued by Doctor Ricci concerning this statue to be obtained in Ravenna, I will not in these pages enter into any statement as to who he was, or respecting the sculptor who executed the statue, satisfying myself with stating that the warrior died close to Ravenna, and that the statue is, in my opinion, one of the two finest in Northern Italy. The head is a little constrained in position and could not have fallen quite as it does in the marble, but when once this criticism is made, there is little more to be said, as this is one of the most marvellous effigies of the sleep of death that was ever executed. The warrior is at peace; he is in a sound sleep, but never to wake again, and the eyes fill with tears as the full meaning of that sleep is gathered up, and as one gazes at the placid and wonderful sleeping form.

In the fifth room there is a fine work by Alunno (202) and an interesting work by Fiorenzo (211), and in the room beyond there is a very curious collection of pictures which it seems specially suitable to find in Ravenna. It is a collection of Byzantine paintings, Eastern, Russian, Greek, some of them of great beauty and in wonderful order, and others possessing that strange resemblance to each other and to a fixed model that characterizes the sacred pictures of the unchanging Eastern Church. Numbers 269, 284, and 222 may be mentioned as specially important, but the little room contains many works of interest and is well worth inspection.

From this picture-gallery we pass into the museum close at hand.

It is contained in the building of the old Carthusian monastery of Classe, and includes the Church of St. Romuald in its extent. Opposite to the entrance door is the * tomb of the Exarch Isaac, which was originally in the Church of San Vitale, and which was erected to his memory by his wife Susannah. It has a long inscription in Greek upon it recording his fame, both in the East and in the West, and lamenting her own terrible bereavement. It was erected in 645, and is a fine marble sarcophagus of the regular Ravenna shape, and has upon it reliefs of the Adoration of the Magi, the Raising of Lazarus, and the Delivery of Daniel from the Lions' Den. The strange caps of the Magi should be noted, as they wear them also in the mosaic we have lately seen in Sant' Apollinare Nuovo.

Under the dome of the church is the great porphyry bath which was once in the palace of Theodoric, and used to be styled his tomb. It is said to have once contained his ashes, and to have been in the mausoleum, but it is quite evidently a fine Roman bath, and probably had no connection with the burying-place of the emperor, but may of course have been used by him in his palace, where until recently it was preserved.

Close to it stands a fine Renaissance shrine of 1547, and a beautiful Lavabo fountain.

In the sacristy in the museum, the gold ornaments in Case I. are worth attention, the illuminations, the splendid pastoral staff, and the cover of a thurible. In Case II. the ivories are of great importance and of high merit. There are also some fine vestments. The gold ornaments have evident connection with the Gothic possession of Ravenna and with the time of Odoacer.

Some exquisite perforated panels will be seen, some fine capitals, some portions of mosaic, and of inscriptions a great many, some of which are of the greatest archaeological importance. On the whole the museum is one of unusual interest, and contains many things that, given plenty of time, it will be worth your inspecting, and will be found to give information as to the past history of Ravenna. There is no catalogue of it to be obtained.

I may perhaps add that as a memorial of the time when Ravenna belonged to Venice the great ruined fortification walls will be found of interest.

We have now only one more sight to visit, but it is the most disappointing one, as in no way is it worthy of its purpose.

The **tomb of Dante stands close to the hotel, and is a place of pilgrimage to every visitor, but it is a poor, unimportant building, distinguished by no artistic merit, of debased architecture, tawdry effect, and almost vulgar appearance. It contains the undoubted remains of one of the world's greatest men, and it is altogether unworthy to contain them, and utterly unsuitable for its high purpose.

The tomb itself, the inscriptions and the urn, are all fairly good in execution, but for so supremely great a man they are an unfitting memorial, and the building in which they are contained is only rendered important by reason of the sacred ashes which it holds.
